Borde, or Boorde, Andrew, M.D. in Latin Andreas Perforatus, b. about 1600, d. 1549, was a native of Sussex, and educated at Oxford. Although a man of learning, he occasionally enacted the part of an itinerant doctor, and the tale of Merry Andrew is said to be derived from him. Hearne tells us that he "frequented markets and fairs where a confux of people used to get together, to whom he prescribed, and to induce them to flock thither the more readily, he would make humorous speeches."

His excuse for this Opprobrium Medicorum must be the "rambling head and inconstant mind" which Wood asserts that he possessed. He pub. several works: Prynepyles of Astronomy, Lon., 1540, 8vo; reprint. 100 copies, 4 on vellum, Lon., 1814, 8vo. The first Boke of the Introduction of Knowledge, the which doth teach a man to speake part of al maner of languages, and to knowe the usage and fashion of al maner of countryes, &c., Lon., 1542, 4to; new edit. by Copland, sine anno.

"Probably the most curious and generally interesting volume ever put forth from the press of the Coplands."—DIBDIN.

The work is partly in verse, partly in prose, with wooden cuts prefixed to each of the 39 chapters.

"The first is a satire, as it appears, on the fickle nature of an Englishman: the symbolical print prefixed to this chapter exhibiting a naked man, with a pair of shears in one hand, and a roll of cloth in the other, not determined what sort of a coat he shall order to be made, has more humour than any of the verses which follow."

The two first of the verses are these:

"I am an Englemaan, and naked I stand here, Musing in my mind, what rayment I shall wear."

"Nor is the poetry destitute of humour only; but of every embellishment, both of metrical arrangement and expression. Borde has all the boldness of allusion, and barbarity of versification, belonging to Skelton, without his strokes of satire and severity."—Warton's Eng. Poetry.

The Breviarie of Healthe for all manner of Sickneses and Diseases, &c., Lon., 1547, 4to. This was approved by the University of Oxford.

"I am confident this book was the first written of that faculty in English, and dedicated to the college of physicians in London. Take a taste out of the beginning of his dedicatory epistle:

"Egregious doctors and masters of the eximious and arcane science of physick, of your urbanity exasperate not yourselves against me for making this little volume of physick."

"Indeed his book contains plain matter under hard words; and was accounted such a jewel in that age (things whilst the first, are esteemed the best, in all kinds) that it was printed cum privilegio ad imprime dum solum."—Fuller's Worthies.

Fuller is much mistaken in giving this work the priority he assigns to it. Compendyouse Regimēto, or Dietary of Healthe made in Mounte Pyllor, 1562, 12mo; 1567, 8vo; 1576, 8vo.

"Of Borde's numerous books, the only one that can afford any degree of entertainment to the modern reader is the Dietarie of Helthe where, giving directions as a physician, concerning the choice of houses, diet, and apparel, and not suspecting how little he should instruct, and how much he might amuse a curious posterity, he has preserved many anecdotes of the private life, customs, and arts of our ancestors."—Warton's Eng. Poetry.

Merie Tales of the Mad Men of Gotham, Lon., 8vo, sine anno, sed circa 1565?

"It was accounted a book full of wit and mirth by scholars and gentlemen. Afterwards being often printed, is now sold only on the stalls of ballad-singers."—Athen. Oxon.

"Hearne was of opinion that these idle pranks of the men of Gotham, a town in Lincolnshire, bore a reference to some customary law-tenures belonging to that place or its neighborhood, now grown obsolete; and that Blount might have enriched his book on ANCIENT TENURES with these ludicrous stories."

A ryght pleasant and merry History of the Myller of Abington, [a village near Cambridge,] with his wife and his faire daughter, and of two poor scholars of Cambridge.

"A messenger epitome of Chaucer's Miller's Tale."

Borde was author of several other works. Consult Wood's Athen. Oxon., Bliss's edit.; Warton's Eng. Poetry; Dibdin's Ames; Brit. Bibliog.; Ritson's Bibl. Poet.; Dodd's Ch. Hist., vol. i.; Cooper's Muses' Library; Phillips's Theatrum Poet. Angl.; Hearne's Pref. to Benedictus Abbas Petroburg.; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

"Dr. Borde was an ingenious man, and knew how to humour and please his patients, readers, and auditors. In his travels and visits, he often appeared and spoke in public; and would often frequent markets and fairs where a confux of people used to get together, to whom he prescribed; and to induce them to flock thither the more readily, he would make humorous speeches, couched in such language as caused mirth, and wonderfully propagated his fame."—Hearne's Benedictus Abb., tom. i.

"Our author Borde was esteemed a noted poet, a witty and ingenious person, and an excellent physician of his time."—Athen. Oxon.

Wood also refers to the tradition of Borde's having been physician to Henry VIII.; but for this opinion Warton could find only "very slender proof."

"A mad physician and a dull poet. . . . Borde's name would not have been now remembered, had he wrote only profound systems in medicine and astronomy. He is known to posterity as a buffoon, not as a philosopher."—English Poetry.

Borde published the jests of John Soogan, the favourite buffoon of the court of Edward the Fourth:

"They are without humour or invention; and give us no very favourable idea of the delicacy of the king and courtiers, who could be exhilarated by the merriments of such a writer."—Warton.

"He furnished Mr. Pope with the greatest part of the materials for forming his grotto at Twickenham, consisting of such curious fossils as the county of Cornwall abounds with; and there may, at present, be seen Dr. Borlase's name in capitals, composed of crystals, in the grotto. On this occasion a very handsome letter was written to the Doctor by Mr. Pope, in which he says, 'I am much obliged to you for your valuable collection of Cornish diamonds. I have placed them where they may best represent yourself, in "a shade, but shining;" alluding to the obscurity of Dr. Borlase's situation, and the brilliancy of his talents. . . . There is still existing a large collection of letters written by that celebrated poet to our Author.'—Biog. Brk.

For rhymes and victimals left the starving bar."

Prol.) In this revision of my work, I have no more space to allot to Mr. Boscawen, or to his rhymes. It is the fate of some men to describe the history of an art without making any progress in it themselves; to write verses without inspiration, and satirical poems without satire. But what said Boileau?"

"One of our best books for common readers. The sentences are short, and the comparisons striking: the language is easy, and the doctrine evangelical: the method proper, the plan comprehensive, the manner searching, yet consolatory. Boswell, Sir Alexander, b. 1775, eldest son of the biographer of Dr. Johnson, was murdered in a duel by Mr. Stuart of Duncarn, March 26, 1822. We say murdered, because we consider all deaths in duels to be cases of murder, calling for the hangman's rope for the survivor. If both parties escape, then perpetual imprisonment, or transportation for life, should preserve society from the contagion of those who so disgrace it. A wise man never yet fought a duel, a courageous man very seldom. As a general rule, cowards and imbeciles compose the ranks of the so-called "Men of Honour." See BOSQUET, A., ante.

Boswell, James, 1740–1795, the friend and biographer of Dr. Johnson, was a native of Edinburgh, a son of a judge, who was called Lord Auchinleck from his estate, in conformity to Scottish custom. He studied law at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Utrecht, and afterwards became an advocate at the Scotch bar. Besides the great work by which he will be known to the latest generations, he pub. several political, legal, and literary essays. His Journal of a Tour to Corsica, pub. Glasg., 1768, 8vo, was received with much favour, and was trans. into the German, Dutch, Italian, and French languages.

"Your Journal is curious and delightful. I know not whether I could name any narrative by which curiosity is better excited or better gratified."—Dr. Johnson to Boswell.

His introduction to Dr. Johnson occurred May 16, 1763. Perhaps no one who has read Boswell's amusing account of this interview will ever forget it! It is unnecessary to enter into any detail respecting a matter so well known as the character of James Boswell. The reader will find a review of Croker's Boswell's Johnson in the Edinburgh Review for 1831, by Mr. Macaulay, in which these three gentlemen are depicted with more strength of colouring than accuracy of drawing. Boswell's Life of Johnson did not appear until 1791, 2 vols. 4to, six years after the demise of his subject. The sale from 1791 to 1805 reached about 4000 copies. We cannot better occupy our space than by quoting some opinions concerning this renowned work. Mr. John Wilson Croker deserves great credit for his excellent edition of Boswell. We venture this assertion notwithstanding the unaccountable attempt of Mr. Macaulay to depreciate the value of Mr. C.'s editorial labours. We beg to present on the other side the commendation of an authority whose decision will hardly be questioned:

"The edition of Boswell by my able and learned friend, Mr. Croker, is a valuable accession to literature; and the well-known accuracy of that gentleman gives importance to his labours."—LORD BRIDGEMAN: article "Johnson," in Times of George III.

That Mr. Croker has occasionally lost his way in a wilderness of 2500 notes, cannot be disputed; that Mr. Macaulay is not altogether infallible, is equally certain. Our warm admiration of Mr. Macaulay's remarkable powers makes us the more regret that the embarras des richesses—the fruit of his vast erudition—should render him sometimes unable to perceive the merit of those whom he criticises. Mr. Croker's last edit. was pub. by Mr. Murray in 1848, 1 vol. r. 8vo.

"Boswell's Life of Johnson is the richest dictionary of wit and wisdom any language can boast of; and its treasures may now be referred to with infinitely greater ease than heretofore. Enlarged and illuminated by the industrious researches and the sagacious running criticism of Mr. Croker, it is, without doubt—excepting a few immortal monuments of creative genius—that English book which, were the Island to be sunk to-morrow with all its inhabitants, would be most prized in other days and countries by the students of 'us and our history.' To the influence of Boswell we owe probably three-fourths of what is most entertaining, as well as no inconsiderable portion of whatever is most instructive, in all the books of memoirs that have subsequently appeared. A really good Index has now, for the first time, been given with a book that above any other wanted one; and we pronounce this 'Boswell' the best edition of an English book that has appeared."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

We might adduce many more testimonies to the excellence of Mr. Croker's edition. Perhaps a dozen such are lying before us, but we must content ourselves with the following:

"We cannot believe that any subsequent improvement will ever be made upon this edition; and we have no doubt that it will excite the curiosity and reward the attention of the reading world. We hope that we shall be able to repeat the saying of a distinguished writer of the last age—'Every one that can buy a book has bought Boswell.'"—North American Review.

We add a few more commendations of Boswell's Johnson: "I now appreciate, with a keen recollection of the pleasure which, in common with every tolerably well-educated Englishman, I have felt, and shall continue to my very latest hour to feel, in the perusal of the biography of Dr. Samuel Johnson, by James Boswell, his companion, his chronicler, and his friend. This fascinating, and I may add truly original, composition, is a work for all times. In reading it, we see the man—

—Vir ipse, sic ille manus, sic ora ferat."

We even hear his voice, and observe his gesticulations. The growl of discontent and the shout of triumph equally pervade our ears. Walking, sitting, reading, writing, talking, all is Johnsonian. We place Boswell's Johnson in our libraries, as an enthusiast hangs up his Gerard Dow in his cabinet—to be gazed at again and again; to feed upon, and to devour."—Dibdin's Library Companion.

"In these memoirs of Dr. Johnson there are so many witty sayings, and so many wise ones, by which the world if it pleases may be at once entertained and improved, that I do not regret their publication."—Buxton House.

"Boswell's Life of Johnson is one of the best books in the world. It is assuredly a great, a very great work. Homer is not more decidedly the first of heroic Poets.—Shakspeare is not more decidedly the first of Dramatists.—Demosthenes is not more decidedly the first of Orators, than Boswell is the first of biographers. He has distanced all his competitors so decidedly that it is not worth while to place them: Eclipse is first, and all the rest nowhere. We are not sure that there is in the whole history of the human intellect so singular a phenomenon as this book. Many of the greatest men that ever lived have written biography; Boswell was one of the smallest men that ever lived, and he has beaten them all."—T. B. MACAULAY: Ethn. Review, 1831.

"Boswell's Life of Johnson is such a masterpiece in its particular species, as perhaps the literature of no other nation, ancient or modern, could boast. It preserves a thousand precious anecdotal memorials of the state of the arts, manners, and policy among us during this period; such as must be invaluable to the philosophers and antiquaries of a future age."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

"There are few books that have afforded more amusement, or probably imparted more instruction, than what is usually called Boswell's Life of Johnson; which is, in fact, chiefly Boswell's repetition of the conversations of that great man whose name adorns the title-page of his work. Perhaps it is only from the literary productions of Johnson himself, and scarcely even from them, that equal advantage is to be reaped."

Mr. Croker calls our attention to the important fact that Boswell really saw very little of his great friend:

"Of above twenty years, therefore, that their acquaintance lasted, periods equivalent in the whole to about three-quarters of a year only, fell under the personal notice of Boswell. . . . It appears from the Life, that Mr. Boswell visited England a dozen times during his acquaintance with Dr. Johnson, and that the number of days in which they met were about 180, to which is to be added the time of the Tour, when they were together from the 18th August to the 22d November, 1778; in the whole about 276 days. The number of pages in the separate editions of the two works is 2628, of which 1330 are occupied by the history of those 276; so that a little less than an hundredth part of Dr. Johnson's Life occupies above one-half of Mr. Boswell's work. . . . Every one must regret that his personal intercourse with his great friend was not more frequent or more continued."—Preface.

Bouvier, Hannah M., b. 1811, at Philadelphia, only child of the succeeding, and the inheritor of his ardent love of knowledge, devotion to study, and remarkable powers of mental analysis, in addition to the ordinary routine of a liberal education, has cultivated with eminent success the higher branches of astronomical science. In 1857, she gave to the world the results of her studious application in a volume entitled Familiar Astronomy; or, An Introduction to the Study of the Heavens, illustrated by Celestial Maps and upwards of 200 finely-executed Engravings. To which is added A Treatise on the Globes, and a Comprehensive Astronomical Dictionary, [with a copious Index,] for the Use of Schools, Families, and Private Students, Phila., 1857, 8vo, pp. 499. This admirable manual at once elicited the enthusiastic commendation of many of the most distinguished astronomers both in Great Britain and America,—viz.: Lord Rosse, Sir John F. W. Herschel, Sir David Brewster, Rear-Admiral W. H. Smyth, J. Russell Hind, John Narrien, G. B. Airy, J. P. Nichol, Dr. Lardner, Dr. Dick, William Lassell, George Bishop, A. De Morgan, Rev. W. R. Dawes, W. C. Bond, B. A. Gould, Jr., Lieut. Maury, Denison Olmsted, W. H. C. Bartlett, Stephen Alexander, and Elias Loomis. We annex a few quotations from these opinions:

"I consider it a work of great value. It is evidently the result of a careful consideration, not only of the different branches of astronomy properly so called, (as embodied in the publication of various kinds which have attracted great attention in the present day, especially the records of new classes and with new instruments,) but also of the collateral sciences,—optics, for example. So far as I know, no work which I have seen, of a partly-familiar character, contains so much accurate information on astronomy."—Geo. EDDELL AIRY, Astronomer Royal of England, Nov. 4, 1856.

"I consider it a work very well calculated to give an accurate knowledge of the principal facts of astronomy and to prepare a young student for the perusal of works of a more abstruse and technical nature."—SIR JOHN F. W. HERSCHEL, March 2, 1857.

"Familiar Astronomy is a work exhibiting the scientific soul and intelligence of its author; and from the method of question and answer it appears to be admirably adapted for teaching that delightful science."—REAR-ADMIRAL W. H. SMYTH.

"I have inspected the greater part of the volume, and have formed a very high opinion of it and of the genius and laborious investigations of the authoress. It is a work which embraces almost every thing requisite for imparting to general readers a knowledge of every branch of astronomical science; and the information it communicates is both ample and correct. The volume is handsomely got up: the pictorial illustrations are beautiful and accurate, particularly those which exhibit the nebulae and other phenomena of the sidereal heavens."—DR. DICK, Dec. 27, 1856.

"The leading facts of astronomy up to the present time are accurately and clearly stated: and in the selection of materials, the arrangement and style, the work appears to be the best elementary book I have seen."—LORD ROSS, the owner of the great Ross Telescope.

"In this list we must not omit mention of a remarkable American woman, who has achieved signal success in the science of astronomy,—who, in fact, may justly be termed the Mary Somerville of the United States."—TALLENZ: Bibliographical Guide, new ed. 1858.

Bouvier, John, 1787–1851, Recorder of the City of Philadelphia, Associate Judge of the Court of Criminal Sessions in the same city, and an eminent legal writer, was a native of the village of Codognan in the department of Gard, in the south of France. Having been a resident of America since his 15th year, and identifying his name with American and English jurisprudence, we need make no apology for enrolling the name of Judge Bouvier in a list of British and American authors. The first indication which John Bouvier exhibited of that remarkable power of analysis which eminently distinguished his mind, was the production of an abridgment of Blackstone's Commentaries, the fruit of his leisure hours whilst preparing for admission to the bar. In 1839 he pub. a work, which, with all the rest of his useful and laborious compilations, has attained great and deserved popularity:

A Law Dictionary, adapted to the Constitution and Laws of the United States of America, and of the several States of the American Union; with References to the Civil and other Systems of Foreign Law. Phila., 2 vols. 4th edit. revised, improved, and greatly enlarged, Phila., 1853, 2 vols. r. 8vo. The following excellent mottoes, than which nothing better could have been chosen, appear on the title-page:

"Ignorantia terminis ignorantur et ara."—CO. LITT. 2 a.
 "Je sais que chaque science et chaque art a ses termes propres, inconnu au commun des hommes."—FLEURY.

A layman's commendation of a profound professional work very properly carries with it but little weight. For this cause, and other obvious reasons, we have always preferred, in our Encyclopædia, to adduce the opinions of eminent authorities upon works respecting which similar pursuits had authorized a judgment at once intelligent and ex cathedra.

"Immediately on its appearance, this work received the entire and cordial approval of our most eminent jurists, such as Story and Kent, Greenleaf, Randall, and Baldwin, and was received with equal approbation in other lands. Joy, the distinguished Irish writer of 'Lectures on Legal Education in England and Ireland,' not only commended it in his volume as a 'work of a most elaborate character as compared with English works of a similar nature,' but in a private letter to its author expressed his sense of his high reputation. To this work the Judge had devoted the most unremitting labour for ten years; and during the remainder of his life he spent much time on its improvement. Many of its articles were rewritten, and large additions made to it, so that the fourth edition may be said to be the work of nearly a quarter of a century."—From the National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans.

"Bouvier's Law Dictionary is the best book of the kind in use for the American lawyer. It contains sufficient reference to English and foreign law, with a very full synopsis of such portions of American jurisprudence as require elucidation. In the second edition the author recast many of the titles, and added about a thousand new ones. By means of correspondence with members of the bar in different states, and by a careful examination of local treatises, the author has produced not only a good American Law Dictionary, but one sufficiently local for all practical purposes."—Marvin's Legal Bibliography, p. 138.

Extract of a Letter to Judge Bouvier from Chief Justice Story:
 "A very important and most useful addition to our judicial literature. It supplies a defect in our libraries, where the small dictionaries are so brief as to convey little information of an accurate nature to students, and the large ones are rather compendiums of the law, than explanatory statements of terms. Yours has the great advantage of an intermediate character. It defines terms, and occasionally explains subjects, so as to furnish students at once the means and the outlines of knowledge. I will feel greatly honoured by the dedication of the work to me, &c. With the highest respect, truly your obliged friend, JOSEPH STORY."
 "I have run over almost every article in it, and beg leave to add, that I have been deeply impressed with the evidences throughout the volumes, of the industry, skill, learning, and judgment with which the work has been compiled."—CHANCELLOR KENT.
 "Not only the best which has been published, but in itself a valuable acquisition to the bar and bench, by which both will profit."—HON. JUDGE BALDWIN, U. S. Supreme Court.
 "One of the most useful works of the kind in print."—HON. JUDGE RANDALL, U. S. District Court.
 "For extent of research, clearness of definitions and illustration, variety of matter and exactness of learning, it is not surpassed by any in use, and, on every account, I think, is preferable to them all."—HON. JUDGE GREENLEAF.

In 1841 Judge Bouvier undertook the laborious task of the preparation of a new edition of Bacon's Abridgment of the Law, in 10 r. 8vo volumes, including about 8,000 pages. One of these volumes was edited by Judge Randall; and Mr. Robert E. Peterson, the well-known publisher of Philadelphia, a son-in-law of Judge Bouvier, took charge of a portion of another volume. With this exception, the whole of this Herculean task devolved upon our indefatigable author, who completed it in the intervals of business in only four years!

"Among other improvements, he prepared the first index it ever had, for each volume, and a general one for the whole. A single sentence as to the character of this work, as it came from his hands, would be entirely superfluous." See BACON, MATTHEW.

Judge Bouvier had now earned a substantial claim to the gratitude of the profession, by the laborious zeal with which he had endeavoured to provide for the student a clue through the apparently interminable labyrinth of statute and common law. But he had long felt the need of a compendious, yet easily comprehensible, summary of American law, which should at once serve as a guide to the youthful student, and as a convenient digest of knowledge, perhaps acquired in earlier years, but now partially forgotten, by the "Gamaliels of the profession." The mind of no man can be guaranteed as "marble to retain," and between that which we never knew, and that which we know not when we need it, there is for practical purposes but little difference.

The analytical system of Pothier was held by our author in great admiration. His mind was essentially of the same cast—delighting in rigid analysis of subject, scrupulous care in classification, and severe accuracy in definition and terminology. It is well known that the compilers of the Code Napoleon owe much of the credit which has rewarded their labours to the Pandects Justinianæ, and other works of Pothier. Judge Bouvier determined to undertake a compend of American law, based upon the method of Pothier. Finding his own views as to the systematical arrangement of legal subjects confirmed by so eminent an authority, he was strengthened by that encouragement which mental assimilation always confers upon men of remarkable grasp of intellect. When contemplating "enterprises of great pith and moment," it is a great satisfaction to the adventurer to find that others have been inflamed by the same zeal, and buoyed up under difficulties by a like hope. The sailor who "hugs the coast," cares little for companionship; but he who encounters a fellow-mariner on the wide waste of waters feels the consolations of sympathy and continues his voyage with renewed courage. That we may not be suspected of under-estimation of labours of which we must necessarily be an incompetent judge, we shall strengthen our position by some brief extracts from some of the most learned "opinions" of which the American bench and bar can boast.

The Institutes of American Law was pub. in 1851, in 4 vols. 8vo. The author may be said to have "died in the harness:" in two months after he had the gratification of seeing the result of his arduous labours given to the world, he was gathered to the "house appointed for all living."

"It is a work of very great value. . . . The general plan, and the order and arrangement of the subjects of which it treats, could not, I think, be improved. And I may say the same thing of the manner in which the plan is carried into execution. For every principle and rule is stated with brevity and perspicuity, and supported by proper reference."—HON. ROGER B. TANET, Chief Justice of the United States.

"I know of no work which shows so much research, and which embodies so generally the elementary principles of American Law, as the Institutes of Mr. Bouvier. His name is most favourably known to the profession by his previous works; and I am greatly mistaken if his Institutes shall not add to his high reputation as an able and learned law-writer. The Institutes ought not only to be found in the hands of every student of law, but on the shelf of every lawyer."—HON. JOHN MCLEAN, Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"It forms a valuable addition to legal science, and is well calculated to become a text-book for students."—HON. JOHN M. READ.

Bowditch, Nathaniel, LL.D., 1773-1838, a native of Salem, Massachusetts, has won an enduring reputation by his translation of, accompanied with a commentary on, the Mécanique Céleste of La Place, pub. in 4 large 4to vols., Boston, 1829, '32, '34, '38. The example of Bowditch should operate as a stimulus to the ambition of every uneducated youth who desires to supply the defects of earlier years. The son of a cooper, he was taken from school at the age of ten years, and apprenticed to a ship-chandler. On attaining his majority, he went to sea as an inferior officer in a merchant vessel. So great was his thirst for knowledge, and so accurate his powers of observation, that he had arranged an Almanac, complete in all its parts, at the age of 15. His first publication was The Practical Navigator.

"Scarcely surpassed in usefulness by any of the time, and immediately driving all others of the same class out of circulation."—N. American Review.

The English edit. of this work, edited by Kirby, was pub. in London by Mr. Hardy, 1802, 8vo. By accident he obtained a copy of Newton's Principia, and taught himself Latin that he might read the work, and he made a translation of the whole.

He made four voyages to the East Indies, and one to Europe, and at the age of 30 became President of an Insurance Company in his native town. This office he held for twenty years, when he was transferred to the place of Actuary of the Massachusetts Life Insurance Company, which post he held for the rest of his life. He lived to superintend through the press the whole of his translation of La Place, with the exception of the pages post 1000 of vol. iv. The expense of publication was estimated at $10,000, (which it exceeded,) and although the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and some of his personal friends offered to issue the work at their own cost, he declined their liberal proposal, and determined, with the consent of his family, to undertake it himself. Their decision as to whether he should expend one-third of his fortune in this enterprise deserves to be recorded. His wife, without whose encouragement Bowditch often declared his great work would never have seen the light, urged him to give the result of his labours to the world, and promised to make any sacrifice which would facilitate his plans. His children urged him to go on: "We value your reputation more than your money," was their noble response. The work was most favourably received.

"The idea of undertaking a translation of the whole Mécanique Céleste, accompanied throughout with a copious running commentary, is one which savours, at first sight, of the gigantesque, and is certainly one which, from what we have hitherto had reason to conceive of the popularity and diffusion of mathematical knowledge on the opposite shores of the Atlantic, we should never have expected to have originated—or, at least, to have been carried into execution—in that quarter. The first volume only has as yet reached us; and when we consider the great difficulty of printing works of this nature, to say nothing of the heavy and probably unremunerated expense, we are not surprised at the delay of the second. Meanwhile, the part actually completed (which contains the first two books of Laplace's work) is, with few and slight exceptions, just what we could have wished to see—an exact and careful translation into very good English—exceedingly well printed, and accompanied with notes appended to each page, which leave no step in the text of moment unsupplied, and hardly any material difficulty either of conception or reasoning unelucidated. To the student of 'Celestial Mechanism' such a work must be invaluable."—Lon. Quarterly Review, vol. xlvii. 1832.

Now that they are in print, we believe that they will be regarded as exhibiting signal ability, and as possessing very high merits, by those who, not having been hearers, shall give them a careful perusal. . . . We shall be disappointed if his volume is not received as a most valuable contribution to speculative philosophy, not merely by men of the conservative and cautious schools, but by the mass of those deliberate and unprejudiced readers who know not that they belong to any party. . . . We commend this volume, first of all, because it is written in the vernacular tongue, in good, wholesome English. It is free from barbarisms, Germanisms, and all affectations. Bower, Archibald, 1686-1766, a native of Dundee, Scotland, was educated at the Scots College, Douay, removed to Rome in 1706, and became a Jesuit in 1712. In 1726 he came to England, having fled from the Inquisition at Macerata, of which he was an officer, and about 1732 he conformed to the Church of England. He was readmitted into the order of the Jesuits about 1744, after which he again became a Protestant. His wife declared that he died in the Protestant faith; his will contains no declaration as to his final religious opinions. It is difficult to tell what degree of credit to allow either to his representations or to the charges of his enemies, but there is enough doubt upon the subject to prevent his being very zealously claimed by either the Church of England or that of Rome.

Whilst living with Lord Aylmer, he undertook the charge of the Historia Literaria; or an Exact and Early Account of the most Valuable Books published in the several Parts of Europe: pub. monthly, 1730-34, 4 vols. 8vo. He wrote the preface to this work, and several of the articles in Italian, being as yet unskilled in the English language. See Review of Reviews, by the author of this Dictionary, in Putnam's Monthly Mag., New York, vol. i. and ii., 1853-54.

From 1734 to 1744 he was employed by the proprietors of the Universal History, in writing for that work the Roman History, which Psalmanazar (who wrote most of the other portions of the Ancient History in that collection) declares that he did very ill. See Psalmanazar's Life, p. 308. Bower also edited the second edition of the Universal History, and received £200 for doing very little, and that done so badly as to require careful revision. The value of this extensive series, 1749-66, bound in 65 vols., sometimes in a fewer number, is not to be disputed.

"I generally consult the Universal History, a work of great merit, and perhaps not sufficiently valued."—Bulter's Horæ Biblicæ.

"Consult the volumes of the Universal History, where you will find, either in the text or references, every historical information which can well be required."—Prof. Smyth's Lect. on Modern Hist.

Warburton refers to "the infamous rhapsody, called the Universal History—miserable trash," but of all Literary Bull Dogs, perhaps the bosom friend of Pope was the most dogmatic. Gibbon's opinion draws a just discrimination:

"The excellence of the first part of the Universal History is generally admitted. The History of the Macedonians is executed with much erudition, taste, and judgment. The history would be invaluable, were all its parts of the same merit."—Miscell. Works.

Mr. Swinton gave Dr. Johnson a list of the authors, which will be found in a note from the doctor to Nichols, Dec. 6, 1784. (Boswell's Johnson.) Bower now turned his attention to the publication of a History of the Popes, a portion of which he says he had prepared whilst at Rome. This work was pub. at intervals from 1748-66, 7 vols. 4to. In the year in which his 1st vol. appeared, he was appointed Librarian to Queen Caroline. This history led to a warm controversy. His character was attacked as entirely unworthy of credit, and sufficient evidence was produced to ruin his reputation with the public at large, notwithstanding his exculpatory pamphlets, (pub. 1756-61.) His tried friend, Lord Lyttelton, however, refused to credit any thing against Bower:

"The merit of the work will bear it up against all these attacks; and as to the ridiculous story of my having discarded him, the intimate friendship in which we continue to live will be a sufficient answer to that, and better than any testimony formally given."—Lord Lyttelton to Dr. Doddridge, Oct. 1751.

In 1757 an abridgment of the first four vols. of the History of the Popes was pub. in French, at Amsterdam. An idea of the incompetency of the author for the production of a great historical work, may be inferred from the fact that he compresses the eventful history of the Church from 1600 to 1758 into 26 pages!

When Bower can confirm his position by history, we give him credence; where his assertions only are in court, we give the accused the benefit of the doubt. See the Rev. Bowie, John, 1725–1788, known by his friends as Don Bowie, from his attachment to Spanish literature, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. Entering into holy orders, he was presented to the vicarage of Idmeston, Wilts, where he continued until his death. He was a man of great erudition, and was the principal detector of Lauder's forgeries. See LAUDER, WILLIAM.

Miscell. Pieces of English Ancient Poesie, 1765. A Letter to Dr. Percy, respecting a new and classical edition of Don Quixote, 1777. He pub. his edit. of Don Quixote in 1781, in 6 vols. 4to! The first 4 contain the text, the 5th is composed of annotations, and the 6th gives a copious index. The subscription price was three guineas. This enormous enterprise proved a failure. However, let the lover of Spanish lore fail not to secure a copy if he can. So resolved that odd antiquary, Rev. Michael Tyson:

"Is Bowie's Don Quixote published, or not? Though I did not chuse to seem to be acquainted with the Editor by appearing amongst the Subscribers, yet I like Cervantes so much that I must make a swop, or truck, with Tom Payne for the book."—Tyson to Gough: Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. viii.; and see vol. vi. for an interesting notice of Bowie, and his edition of Don Quixote, &c.

He pub. a number of articles in defence of this work, relative to Warton's History of English Poetry, &c., in Gentleman's Mag.; contributed to the Archæologia, vols. vi. and vii., 1782–85; to Granger's History, and to Johnson's and Steevens's Shakespeare.

"I am not the Translator of Don Quixote. I have too much conceiving of the merit of the original of Cervantes ever to think of appearing in that character. The difficulties of a translator must rise in proportion to his knowledge of the original. . . . A desire to impart that pleasure to others, which I almost solely possessed, impelled me to the hazardous work of printing; in which if I have erred once, I may be easily credited, I shall never be guilty of a like offence again." See Gent. Mag., vols. liv., lv.

We cannot forbear pleasing the lover of the Knight of the Rueful Countenance by transcribing the delicious Bill of Fare for Quixotic epicures, exhibited by Mr. Bowie in his prospectus:

"A Letter to the Rev. Dr. Percy, concerning a new and classical edition of Historia del valeroso Cavallero Don Quixote de la Mancha; to be illustrated by Annotations and Extracts from the Historians, Poets, and Romances of Spain and Italy, and other writers, ancient and modern; with a Glossary and Indexes, in which are occasionally interspersed some Reflections on the Learning and Genius of the author, with a Map of Spain adapted to the History, and to every Translator of it."

What a glorious prospect is here! Yet the work, as we already said, was a failure. In the words of a cold-blooded critic:

"The public sentiment seemed to be that annotations on Cervantes were not quite so necessary as on Shakespeare."

The enthusiastic Don Bowie, disgusted with such heartlessness, renounced the press, and left the stupid "public" to their downward course of ignorance and fatuity! That any sane man, woman, or child could really be indifferent to the least word, wink, and gesture of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, and the philosophic apothegmatist Sancho Panza, was hard to believe, but if such were the stolidity of that thick-skulled generation,—so let it be! He had discharged his duty; therefore he washed his hands, shook the dust from his feet, locked his library door, and was soon entranced in the fields of La Mancha, the persevering revolutions of the Windmills, the lustre of Mambrino's helmet, and the substantial charms of Dulcinea del Toboso.

Further observations on report Ch. Commiss., 1837. St. Paul at Athens, 1838. A Final Defence of the Rights of Patronage in Deans and Chapters, 1839. In 1807 Mr. B. edited the works of Alexander Pope, in 10 vols. 8vo, for which he received £300. The editor criticized his author, and hence arose an animated controversy. Campbell and Byron attacked the positions of Mr. B., and especially his dogma that "all images drawn from what is beautiful or sublime in the works of nature, are more beautiful and sublime than any images drawn from art; and that they are therefore per se more poetical." To this Byron responded, not very poetically, that "a ship in the wind," with all sail set, is a more poetical object than a "hog in the wind," though the hog is all nature, and the ship all art. This was the Reductio ad absurdum, indeed: although Bowles might have rejoined that the supposed porker, however respectable, could hardly be considered either "sublime or beautiful." This controversy lasted for many years. In 1825 Bowles published his Final Appeal to the Literary Public relative to Pope, elicited by Roscoe's edit. of Pope, in 1825, and in 1826 the last gun was fired by Lessons in Criticism to William Roscoe, &c., F. R. S., in answer to his Letter to the Rev. W. L. Bowles on the Character and Poetry of Pope, 8vo. In 1818 he pub. Vindiciæ Wykehamicæ, in reply to Mr. Brougham, and addressed Two Letters to him when he became Lord Chancellor, on the Position and Incomes of the Cathedral Clergy. In 1826 he pub. The Parochial History of Bremhill, and in 1830–31, The Life of Thomas Ken, D.D. The Annals and Antiquities of Lacock Abbey appeared in 1835. Mr. B. also pub. Letters to Lord Mountcashell and Sir James Mackintosh, and had a controversy with the Rev. Edward Duke, in the Gen. Mag., relative to the antiquities of Wiltshire. Mr. Bowles's reputation as a poet is deservedly great.

In his Literary Biography, Mr. Coleridge expresses in glowing terms the delight he received from the early perusal of Mr. Bowles's sonnets, and the effect which they produced on his own poetry.

"We have ourselves heard from Mr. Wordsworth's own lips, that he got possession of the same sonnets [pub. in 1793] one morning when he was setting out with some friends on a pedestrian tour from London; and that so captivated was he with their beauty, that he retreated into one of the recesses in Westminster Bridge, and could not be induced to rejoin his companions till he had finished them."—Lon. Gent. Mag., 1850.

Mr. Southey freely acknowledges his obligations to our author: he tells Bedford,

"My poetical taste was much mellorated by Bowles."—Oct. 1, 1796.

"This morning I received your St. John in Patmos. I have just read the poem through, and with much pleasure. Yours I should have known it to have been by the sweet and unsophisticated style upon which I endeavoured, now almost forty years ago, to form my own."—Southey to Bowles, July 30, 1832.

"The sonnets of Bowles may be reckoned among the first fruits of a new era in poetry. They came in an age when a commonplace facility in rhyming on the one hand, and an almost nonsensical affectation in a new school on the other, had lowered the standard so much, that critical judges spoke of English poetry as of something nearly extinct, and disinclined to read what they were sure to disapprove. In these sonnets there was observed a grace of expression, a musical versification, and especially an air of melancholy tenderness, so congenial to the poetical temperament, which still, after sixty years of a more propitious period than that which immediately preceded their publication, preserves for their author a highly respectable position among our poets. The subsequent poems of Mr. Bowles did not belie the promise of his youth."—HENRY HALLAM: Address before the Royal Society of Literature.

"Breathes not the man with a more poetic temperament than Bowles! No wonder that his 'eyes love all they look on,' for they possess the sacred gift of beautifying creation by shedding over it the charm of melancholy. . . . His human sensibilities are so fine as to be of themselves poetical; and his poetical aspirations so delicate as to be always human."—PROFESSOR WILSON: Blackwood's Mag., Sept. 1831.

"Bowles was deficient in the passion and imagination which command great things, but he was, notwithstanding, a true poet. He had a fine eye for the beautiful and the true: and, although his enthusiasm was tempered, we never miss a cordial sympathy with whatever is pure, noble, and generous,—for his heart was in the right place."—*Moir's Poet. Bowyer, William, 1699–1777, will long be remembered as the most learned English printer of whom we have any account. The names of Stephens, of Aldus, of Bowyer, and such men, may ever be pointed to with commendable pride by the superintendent of the type and matrix. Bowyer's father and grandfather were printers, so that he may be said to have inherited the noble art. William was born in Dogwell Court, White Fryars, London, December 19th. He studied for a time under the celebrated AMBROSE BONWICK, (q. v.) and in 1716 was admitted as a sizar at St. John's College, Cambridge. He remained here till June, 1722, during which time he obtained Roper's exhibition, and wrote in 1719 what he styled Epistola pro Sodalitio à rev. viro F. Roper mihi legato. It does not appear that he took his degree of B.A. In 1722 he entered into the printing business as a partner with his father. From this time until his death Mr. Bowyer was engaged in superintending his press, and contributing to various learned works in the way of corrections, prefaces, annotations, &c. The learned men of the day found it a great advantage to have in the person of their printer a scholar whose erudition and classical taste could rectify their errors and improve their lucubrations. A copious account of Mr. B.'s editorial labour of this description will be found in that most delightful of books of the class—NICHOLS'S LITERARY ANECDOTES OF THE 18TH CENTURY, 9 vols., 1812–15; continued as ILLUSTRATIONS OF LITERARY HISTORY, 1817–48, 7 vols. The foundation of this work was a pamphlet of 52 pages, 1778, entitled Biographical Memoirs of Mr. Bowyer; enlarged to a 4to vol. in 1782; still further enlarged as above. See NICHOLS, JOHN. A valuable account of Bowyer will be found, also, in Chalmers's Biog. Dict. In 1763 Mr. Bowyer pub. his celebrated edition of the Greek Testament, 2 vols. 12mo, containing his Conjectural Emendations. A second edit. of the Emendations was pub. separately in 1772, 8vo, under the following title: Conjectures on the New Testament, collected from various Authors, as well in regard to Words as Pointing, with the reasons on which both are founded. A third edit. appeared in 1782, 4to, and a fourth in 1812, 4to. The great merits of this work were conceded from the first.

"I must not omit to return my thanks for your notes upon the Greek Testament, and particularly for the excellent Preface before them. They have been of great use to me and others on several occasions, and I wish we had more such collections by equally able hands."—ANACRATOR BLACKBURN, in 1766; the celebrated author of the Confessional, q. v. name.

"I would also recommend a look into a Greek Testament lately published by Mr. Bowyer, a printer, whose erudition not only sets him on a par with the best scholars among the early printers, but would do credit to persons of high rank even in the learned professions."—Two Grammatical Essays, &c., 1760.

"This Work cannot but be acceptable to every Critical Reader of the New Testament, as it is the best Collection of Conjectural Emendations which has yet appeared."—Lon. Critical Review.

"The reader will here meet with much sound criticism, and many instances of the importance of true punctuation, which Mr. Bowyer considered of more importance than all the various readings put together."—BISSE WATSON.

"A book which ought to be read by every scholar and every rational Christian."—DR. PARR.

But the British Critic does not coincide with Dr. Parr, altogether:

"Bowyer's work is for the learned only; and for those among the learned who can discriminate and judge for themselves. Conjectures on the sacred text are, at best, extremely hazardous; hence it is that the work, though valuable, can deserve only a partial recommendation."—Brit. Critic, pref. to vol. vi. For a Review of the 4th edit., see Brit. Critic, O. S. xi. 507; for Reviews of former edits., see Monthly Review, O. S., xvi. 67.

"As conjectures, the best that can be said of them is, that they are often ingenious. The alterations in the pointing are not, properly, conjectural, and therefore may be more safely trusted."—Osann.

Bishop Marsh remarks that "In the Greek Testament our means of correction from authority are so ample, that conjecture is unnecessary; and, if unnecessary, it is injurious, especially in a work, where, if the words might be altered from conjecture, a door would be opened to every species of corruption."

The same eminent authority gives Mr. Bowyer full credit for his scholarship:

"Bowyer's Conjectures are of real value."

We should mention that the writers from whom the selection is principally made, besides Bowyer himself, are Bishop Barrington, Mr. Markland, Professor Schultz, Michaelis, Dr. Henry Owen, Dr. Woide, Dr. Gosset, and Stephen Weston.

In 1774 appeared Mr. Bowyer's Origin of Printing, in two essays: 1. The Substance of Dr. Middleton's Dissertation on the Origin of Printing in England. 2. Mr. Meerman's Account of the Invention of the Art at Haarlem, and its progress to Mentz; with occasional Remarks, and an Appendix. In this work Mr. B. was assisted by Dr. Henry Owen, and Cesar de Missy; 2d edit. enlarged, 1776, 8vo; with a Supplement by John Nichols, 1781, 8vo. This publication, which appeared anonymously, was soon known to be Mr. Bowyer's, and was received with great favour.

"The periodical publications of the Continent joined those of England in its commendation."

"He has interspersed, through the whole piece, a number of valuable notes, which will greatly increase the general stock of knowledge upon the subject."—DR. KIRKE: Monthly Rev. and Biog. Brit.

"Mr. Bowyer's learning and particular knowledge in his profession qualify him for being at least as good a Judge of the dispute as any man that ever lived."—SIR JAMES BURROW: Literary Property.

His trans. of Select Discourses from Michaelis, 12mo, was pub. in 1773. This vol. has become very scarce. See Horne's Introd. to the Scriptures.

In 1785 Mr. Nichols (Mr. B.'s friend and partner) pub. Miscellaneous Tracts, by Mr. Bowyer and several of his learned friends, 4to, and we have already referred the reader to that rich storehouse of literary treasures, Nichols's Literary Anecdotes. It may well be supposed that the amiable character and remarkable erudition of Mr. Bowyer gathered around him a host of devoted friends. We venture the assertion that no man in any age ever had a larger circle of distinguished literary acquaintances. Among these may be mentioned, Archbishop Secker, Bishops Warburton, Kennett, Tanner, Sherlock, Hoadly, Lyttleton, Pearce, Lowth, Barrington, Hurd, Percy, Earl of Macclesfield, Earl of Marchmont, Lord Lyttleton, Lord Sandys, Alexander Pope, Dr. Wotton, Rt. Hon. Arthur Onslow, Chishull, Clarke, Markland, Hollis, De Missy, Mattaire, R. Gale, S. Gale, Browne, Willis, Spelman, Morant, David Garrick, Dean Prideaux, Dean Freind, Dean Milles, Dr. Robert Freind, Dr. John Freind, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Barnard, Dr. Powell, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. Ducarel, Dr. Pegge, Dr. Salter, Dr. Owen, Dr. Heberden, and many others. See Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

"For more than half a century he stood unrivalled as a learned printer: and some of the most masterly productions of this kingdom have been described as appearing from his press. . . . To his literary and professional abilities he added an excellent Moral Character. His regard to Religion was displayed in his Publications, and in the course of his Life and Studies; and he was particularly distinguished by his inflexible probity, and an uncommon alacrity in relieving the necessitous. His liberality in relieving every species of distress, and his endeavours to conceal his benefactions, reflect great honour on his memory."—Nichols's Lit. Anec., vol. III.

"Dr. Boyce was one of the few of our church composers who neither pillaged nor servilely imitated Handel. There is an original and sterling merit in his productions, founded as much on the study of our own old masters, as on the best models of other countries, that gives to all his works a peculiar stamp and character of his own, for strength, clearness, and facility, without any mixture of styles, or extraneous and heterogeneous ornaments." Boyd, Hugh, or Hugh Macaulay, 1746-1791, was educated at Trinity College. The Indian Observer, and some Miscellaneous Works, with an Account of his Life and Writings, by L. D. Campbell, Lon., 1798, 1800, 2 vols. 8vo. Boyd wrote in Ireland a political periodical paper called The Freeholder, 1772; he contributed an Introduction to Lord Chatham's Speeches, and The Whig to the London Courant, pub. by Almon. The Indian Observer, reprinted with other papers, as above, was originally pub. at Madras. Mr. Campbell pub. the above edition of his works to prove Boyd's identity with Junius, an assertion said to have been first made by Almon.

"Boyd wrote after Junius, and, like most political writers, aims at his style; and the only conclusion which his friends have arrived at amounts to this absurdity, that an imitator must be an original writer; and even this in the case of Mr. Boyd is peculiarly unfortunate, for his imitations are among the most feeble that have ever been attempted."

See also another advocate for Mr. Boyd in Chalmers's Appendix to the Supplemental Apology, &c., 1800.

"By comparing Junius with the other writings of M^r Auley Boyd, we see the same characteristics in all: the elegance and energy; the same inaccuracy and inexperience; the same topics and imagery and expressions; the same turbulence; and even in his Observer may be traced

"The cockle of rebellion, insolence, sedition."

Boyle, Charles, fourth Earl of Orrery, grandson of the "Great Earl of Cork," 1676–1731, was the second son of Roger, second Earl of Orrery, by Lady Mary Sackville, daughter to Richard, Earl of Dorset and Middlesex. At 15 he entered a nobleman at Christ Church, Oxford. His talents were so marked that Dr. Aldrich, in completing at his request the compendium of Logic long used at Oxford, styles him Magnum Ædis nostræ ornamentum. Dr. Aldrich's high opinion of his abilities proved in the end a misfortune to Boyle, as the dean's encouragement induced him to undertake the care of the edition of the Epistles of Phalaris, pub. 1695, which provoked the celebrated controversy with "slashing Bentley." This subject we have already treated in the article BENTLEY, RICHARD. The instrument called the Orrery was so named by Sir Richard Steele, in error, from the fact that one of the first was made for the earl by Rowley. The real inventor was a Mr. George Graham. The earl was the author of As You Find It, a Comedy, 1703; in vol. 2d of the Works of Roger, Earl of Orrery; (Lon., 1739, 2 vols. 8vo.) Some Copies of Verses. A Latin Trans. of the Epistles of Phalaris, and Notes to that Author, Oxon., 1695, 8vo; in English, 1698, 12mo. Examination of Dr. Bentley's Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris, and Æsop's Fables, Lon., 1698, 8vo; 1699, 8vo; (chiefly written by ATTERBURY, FREIND, and KING: see these names.) Preamble to his patent of Peerage, Lon., 1711, 4to; An Epilogue to his Predecessor's Attemira, and several Songs in it.

Boyle was in great estimation with the wits of the age. We have already stated that Garth stereotyped his ignorance in the well-known couplet,

"So diamonds owe a lustre to their foil,
And to a BENTLEY 'tis we owe a BOYLE."

See BENTLEY, RICHARD.

His brilliancy was unquestionable, but he was forced to "pale his ineffectual fire" before the splendour of Bentley's rays.

"He resembled in his character, and not a little in his fortunes, his illustrious ancestor, the first Earl of Orrery. Like him, he was an author, a soldier, and a statesman. His learning was solid, not pedantic; and though he did not affect the orator in public, yet in private conversation, no man spoke with greater ease to himself, or pleasure to those who heard him."—DR. CAMPBELL.

Boyle, Hamilton, Earl of Cork and Orrery, second son of John, Earl of Orrery, great-great-grandson of the "Great Earl of Cork," 1730–1764, was admitted in 1748 student of Christ Church, Oxford. His claims to authorship consist of Nos. 60 and 170 in the periodical entitled The World.

"They are drawn up with vivacity, elegance, and humour, affording a proof that if his life had been continued, he would have added new literary honour to his celebrated name and family."

"In this translation his lordship is allowed to have given a very just representation of the character of Pliny, and of the merit of his letters."—PARK.

Memoirs of the Life of Robert Cary, Earl of Monmouth, 1759, 8vo; 2d edit., 1760, 8vo. Letters from Italy, written in 1754 and 1755 to William Duncombe, Esq., 1774. He wrote Nos. 47, 68, and 161, in The World, contributed some Letters to The Connoisseur, (signed G. K., &c.,) and was author of some other pieces. But the publication by which he is chiefly known is, Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr. Jonathan Swift, in a series of Letters, Lon., 1751, 8vo. The earl was much censured for this publication, as it exposed to the world matters which it was thought he should, as Swift's friend, have confined to his own bosom. Warburton, in his letters to Bishop Hurd, takes the earl to task in his usual coarse style, calling them "detestable letters." Dr. Johnson justified his lordship.

"Maclean asked Johnson if it was not wrong in Orrery to expose the defects of a man with whom he had lived in intimacy. Johnson: 'Why no, sir, after the man is dead; for then it is done historically.' . . . He said Orrery was a feeble-minded man: that on the publication of Dr. Delany's Remarks on his book, he was so much alarmed that he was afraid to read them. Dr. Johnson comforted him by telling him they were both in the right; that Delany had seen most of the good side of Swift.—Lord Orrery most of the bad. . . . Speaking of the noble family of Boyle, he said that all the Lord Orrerys till the present had been writers. The first wrote several plays; the second was Bentley's antagonist; the third wrote the life of Swift, and several other things; his son Hamilton wrote some papers in the Advertiser and World."—Brunell's Johnson.

Either Johnson or Boswell was inaccurate here.

"In every domestic and social relation, in all the endearing connections of life, as a husband, a father, a friend, a master, Lord Orrery had few equals. The lustre which he received from rank and title, he reflected back unimpaired and undiminished. . . . He loved truth even to a degree of adoration, and as a real Christian constantly hoped for a better life, there trusting to know the real cause of those effects which here struck him with wonder, but not with doubt."—Duxcombe.

"My friend, the late Earl of Cork, had a great desire to maintain the literary character of his family: he was a genteel man, but did not keep up the dignity of his rank. He was so generally civil, that nobody thanked him for it. . . . If he had been rich, he would have been a very liberal patron. His conversation was like his writings, neat and elegant, but without strength. He grasped at more than his abilities could reach; tried to pass for a better talker, a better writer, and a better thinker than he was."—Dr. Johnson.

Boyle, Richard, the "Great Earl of Cork," 1566–1644, a native of Canterbury, educated at Bene't, or Corpus Christi, College, Cambridge, belongs to political rather than to literary history. We may, however, claim him as an author from his True Remembrances of his Life, pub. in Dr. Birch's Life of the Hon. Mr. [Robert] Boyle, Lon., 1744, 8vo. The literary character of this family is evinced by the fact that we record in our list of authors the following descendants of the Great Earl of Cork: Roger, 5th son; Robert, 7th son; Charles, a grandson; John, a great-grandson; and Hamilton, a great-great-grandson.

Boyle, Hon. Robert, 1627–1691, seventh son and fourteenth child of the "Great Earl of Cork," was born at his father's seat, Lismore Castle, in the province of Munster, Ireland, January 25. When little more than eight years of age he was removed to Eton School, where he remained for four years. In 1638 he was sent to Geneva to continue his studies, and here he devoted himself with great assiduity to Natural Philosophy, the French language, &c. In 1644 he returned to England, and for four months resided with his sister, Lady Ranelagh. From March, 1646, to May, 1650, he was occupied at his estate of Stalbridge in an extensive course of experiments in Natural Philosophy, paying especial regard to Chemistry. He visited Ireland in 1652, and on his return in 1654 put in execution a project which he had long cherished of settling at Oxford, where were many of his learned friends, viz.: Wilkins, Wallis, Ward, Willis, Wren, Bathurst, and others. He resided principally at Oxford until April, 1668, when he settled in London at his sister, Lady Ranelagh's, in Pall Mall. The affectionate relatives never separated again until the death of the Viscountess Ranelagh, in December, 1691; her illustrious brother survived her only a week, and they were buried by each other in the church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields. Mr. Boyle was never married. To a man of the character of Robert Boyle death brought no terrors: the great philosopher had long before learned to "become a little child," and reposed with unfeigned humility, yet confiding hope, in the promises of Him who is "the Resurrection and the Life." Earthly honours he had never courted. Of fifteen children of the "Great Earl of Cork," the philosopher was the only one who never obtained a title. Four of his brothers were peers, and a peerage was often urged upon the subject of our memoir, and as often refused. At the early age of 14 he became duly impressed with the supreme importance of religious truth; and feeling that if religion was any thing, it was every thing, he ever lived "as in his great Taskmaster's eye." He had that active zeal in his Saviour's cause, which puts to shame the coldness and spiritual apathy of the great majority of "those who profess and call themselves Christians." So great was his reverence for the Supreme Being, that he never mentioned the name of God without making a decided pause in the conversation: Sir Peter Pett, who knew him for nearly 40 years, declared himself unable to recollect an instance to the contrary. He wrote a number of religious works, printed at his own expense the Church Catechism and New Testament in Irish, and 500 copies of the Four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles in the Malay Language, published Pocock's Arabic Translation of Grotius's De Veritate for circulation in the Levant, and contributed largely to the Society for Propagating the Gospel in New England. When we add to these proofs of zeal the establishment of the Boyle Lecture, "designed to prove the truth of the Christian Religion among Infidels," we have given sufficient evidence of the existence of a faith proved by works of the most beneficent character.

Whilst at Stalbridge, 1646–50, Boyle was one of a society of learned men, termed by him, The Invisible College; this was the germ of The Royal Society, which was incorporated in 1663. In 1680 Boyle was elected to the Presidency, but declined the honour. His publications were very numerous. His New Experiments, physico-mechanical, touching the spring of the Air and its effects, were pub., Oxford, 1660, 8vo. In a second edit., pub. in 1662, he answered the objections of Linus and Hobbes. A 3d edit. appeared in 1682. Seraphic Love, 1660, 8vo; finished in 1648: this has been translated into Latin. Certain Physiological Essays and other tracts, 1661, 4to; with additions, 1669, 4to. Skeptical Chemist, 1662, 8vo; again, 1679, 8vo. Considerations touching the Usefulness of Experimental Natural Philosophy, 1663, 4to; again, 1664. Experiments and Considerations upon Colours, 1663, 8vo. Trans. into Latin. Considerations upon the Style of the Holy Scriptures, 1663, 8vo; trans. into Latin, Oxf., 1665. Hydrostatical Paradoxes, &c., 1666, 8vo; in Latin, Oxf., 1669, 12mo. Among his other publications (see list in Bibl. Brit.) were, A Continuation of the Experiments on Air. A Discourse of Absolute Rest in Bodies. An Invention to Estimate the Weight of Water. A Discourse of Things above Reason. A Free Inquiry into the Vulgarly received Notion of Nature. A Free Discourse against Customary Swearing. Considerations about the Reconcilableness of Reason and Religion. On the high Veneration Man's Intellect owes to God, peculiarly for his Wisdom and Power. Dr. Birch pub. a collection of his works, in 5 vols. fol., Lon., 1744. Another edition was pub., Lon., 1772, 6 vols. 4to. Philosophical Works abridged, Lon., 1725, 3 vols. 4to. An incomplete edition of his works was pub. in Latin at Geneva in 1676, 4to. Opera varia, Genev., 1680, 4to; again in 1704. Theological Works epitomized by Richard Boulton, Lon., 1699, 4 vols. 8vo; 1715, 3 vols. 8vo. The Sermons delivered at the Boyle Lecture, 1691–1732, with the additions and amendments of the several authors, were pub., Lon., 1739, 3 vols. fol.; an abridgment of the Sermons preached at the Boyle Lecture in 4 vols. 8vo, by Rev. Gilbert Burnet, Lon., 1737. Consult Booksellers' catalogues for a list of those printed separately: and see Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. vi., for the names of the preachers to 1810, and a list to 1846–47 in Darling's Cyc. "If all other defences of religion were lost, there is solid reasoning enough in these volumes to remove the scruples of most unbelievers."—Bishop Watson.

"For much important matter on the province of reason in judging of revelation, I would earnestly recommend the theological writings of the Hon. Mr. Boyle. No man had more thoroughly considered the extent and limits of the human understanding; none, perhaps, ever combined more perfectly the characters of the philosopher and the theologian."—Bishop Van Mildrum.

We should not omit to mention that Lord Clarendon urged Mr. Boyle to enter into holy orders, but remembering that "no man taketh this honour unto himself," and not feeling "inwardly moved" to assume "this Office and Ministration," he remained in the ranks of the laity. Yet religion was ever with him the "primum mobile;" thus honouring God, God forgot not his promise, and highly exalted his servant; for to him was given, in a larger measure than often pertaineth to the sons of men, understanding, and wisdom, and durable riches. His tried friend, Bishop Burnet, chose most appropriately as the text for his funeral discourse, "For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, knowledge, and joy." (Eccles. xi. 26.) It has been truly said that

"The works of Boyle discover the solid learning and great acuteness of the philosopher, blended with all that veneration for God, and love to His revealed will, which so eminently characterized him as a Christian."

The value of his contributions to the cause of science, to the province of Natural Philosophy especially, cannot be too highly esteemed. More than two-thirds of his works are composed of the results of his investigations in Pneumatics, Chemistry, Medicine, and kindred subjects. The philosophers of the day and of succeeding times acknowledge their obligations to Boyle in the strongest terms. What a splendid eulogy is that of the great Boerhaave!

"Mr. Boyle, the ornament of his age and country, succeeded to the genius and enquiries of the great Chancellor Verulam. Which of all Mr. Boyle's writings shall I recommend? All of them! To him we owe the secrets of fire, air, water, animals, vegetables, fossils: so that from his works may be deduced the whole system of natural knowledge."

It has been remarked with reference to the fact that Boyle was born in the same year in which Bacon died: "Sol occubuit; nox nulla secuta est."

"For the history of nature, ancient and modern, of the productions of all countries, of the virtues and improvements of plants, of ores, and minerals, and all the varieties that are in them in different climates, he was by much, by very much, the readiest and perfectest I ever knew, in the greatest compass, and with the nicest exactness."—BISHOP BURNET.

See Sir Isaac Newton's letter to Oldenberg, respecting some of Boyle's experiments, communicated to the Royal Society, pub. in Phil. Trans., 1675.

"As a philosopher he conferred advantages on Science which place him in the same rank with Bacon and Newton. When he began his experiments, the inquiries to which he devoted himself had scarcely carried the students of nature to the threshold of her sanctuary. The most unwarranted suppositions were allowed to hold the place of facts, and reasoning was carried on with but rare appeals to any but a mere empirical experience. Aristotle had still his ardent admirers on the one side, and on the other, Descartes was dazzling, as well as aweing, the minds of men into the belief that Nature had unveiled herself to his bold and subtle gaze."—Channingham's Biog. History.

But Boyle and his associates inherited the inductive system which Bacon had left as a legacy to the world, and to what a noble end did they apply their patrimony!

"To Boyle the world is indebted, besides some very acute remarks and many fine illustrations of his own upon metaphysical questions of the highest moment, for the philosophical arguments in defence of religion, which have added so much lustre to the names of Derham and Bentley; and, far above both, to that of Clarke. . . . I do not recollect to have seen it anywhere noticed, that some of the most striking and beautiful instances of design in the order of the material world, which occur in the sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture, are borrowed from the works of the founder."—*Dugald Stewart, Diss. 1st. Bracton, Henry de, an eminent English lawyer of the 13th century, is stated by Sir William Pole and Prince (vide Worthies of Devon) to have been a native of Devonshire. He appears to have studied at Oxford, where he took the degree of LL.D. In ancient records his name is written in various ways; as Bracton, Bratton, Breton, Bretton, Briton, Britton, and Bryeton: but Bp. Nicolson, who adduces these names, confounds Bracton with John Breton. In 1244 King Henry III. made him one of the judges itinerant. His learned work, De Legibus et Consuetudinibus, was first printed in 1569, folio. In 1640 it was printed in 4to, after an examination of many MSS. It has, however, been alleged that some of the most correct MSS. were overlooked. One of the best MSS. of his valuable works was burnt Oct. 23, 1731, by a fire which seriously damaged the Cotton Library at Ashburnham House. It is divided into five books, and these into tracts and chapters.

"Consistently with the extensiveness and regularity of the plan, the several parts of it are filled with a curious and accurate detail of legal learning; so that the reader never falls of deriving instruction or amusement from the study of this scientific treatise on our ancient laws and customs. It is written in a style much beyond the generality of the writers of the age; being, though not always polished, yet sufficiently clear, expressive, and nervous. The excellence of Bracton's style must be attributed to his acquaintance with the writings of the Roman lawyers and canonists, from whom likewise he adopted greater help than the language in which he wrote. Many of those pithy sentences which have been handed down from him as rules and maxims of our law, are to be found in the volumes of the Imperial and pontifical jurisprudence. . . . The value set on this work soon after its publication is evinced by the treatises of Britton and Fleta, which are nothing more than appendages to Bracton. The latter was intended as an epitome of that author; and the most of the former is confined to the single office of supplying some few articles that had been touched lightly by him, with the addition of the statutes made since he wrote. In after times he continued the great treasure of our ancient jurisprudence. Thus was Bracton deservedly looked up to as the first source of legal knowledge, even so low down as the days of Lord Coke, who seems to have made the author his guide in all inquiries into the foundation of our law."

Our legal readers are aware of the fact that M. Houdard, the Norman advocate, when he prepared an edition of Glanville, Fleta, and Britton, refused to admit Bracton to such good company, on the ground that his writings had corrupted the law of England! This is like turning an aged and virtuous Pater familias out of doors on the charge of disgracing his offspring! For an answer to M. Houdard's assertions, we need only point to his edition of Littleton—Anticennes Loix des François. But we must not forget that laymen are expected to "occupy the place of the unlearned" in such matters. Bracton's great work can never be "ruled out of court" by any "statute of limitations." To the student of law, to the antiquary, and to all who feel pleasure in tracing the progressive improvements of a great science, its value will ever be considerable.

"The law-books of Bracton and Fleta were the ancient law of the land, extending to all cases. These books are so strong, that there has been no means of evading them but by denying their authority, and calling them books of civil law, and I never knew them denied for law except where some statute or ancient usage has altered them."—LORD ALAND.

"There be some ancient writers of the law, namely, Bracton, Britton, and Glanville, whom, as it is not unprofitable to read, so to rely upon them is dangerous; for most of that which they do give forth for law is now antiquated and abolished. Their books are monumenta adoranda rubiginis, which be of more reverence than authority."—FULBECK.

"Bracton and Fortescue are the two most learned of the ancient Lawyers."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"The best of judicial classics."—SIR WILLIAM JONES.

Bradshaw, Henry, an early English poet, d. 1513, entered whilst a boy into the Benedictine monastery of St. Werberg, in Chester, his native city. He studied at Gloucester, now Worcester, College, in the suburbs of Oxford, and after a course of theology

"He returned to his cell at St. Werberg, and in his elder years wrote De Antiquitate & Magnificentia Urbis Cestrise; Chronicon, &c."—so necessary, even to the most devout, is regular labour.

He trans. from the Latin The Holy Lyfe and History of Saynt Werburge, very frutefull for all Christen People to rede. Imprinted by Richard Pynson, 1521, 4to; supposed to have been trans. ante 1500. See an interesting account of this volume in Dibdin's Typog. Antiq. vol. ii. 491. It is a volume of great rarity. Sold in the Woodhouse sale for £31 10s.; priced in *Bibl. Lyfe of Saynt Radegunde. Impr. by Richard Pynson, 4to.

"Although the name of the author or translator of this book does not directly appear upon the face of it, yet on comparing it with the Life of St. Werburge, it may readily be perceived that both were penned by the same person, Henry Bradshaw, but hitherto omitted in every list of his works."—Herbert's Typ. Antiq.

Sold at the Woodhouse sale, 1803, for £17 17s.

"Henry Bradshaw has rather larger pretensions to poetical fame than William of Nassington, although scarcely deserving the name of an original writer in any respect. . . . Hale, a violent reformer, observes, that our poet was a person remarkably pious for the times in which he flourished. This is an indirect satire on the monks, and on the period which preceded the Reformation. I believe it will readily be granted, that our author had more plety than poetry."—Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry.

But andi alteram partem :

"It is presumed from the specimen of Bradshaw's poetry above selected, that his name will stand among the foremost in the list of those of the period wherein he wrote. His descriptions are oftentimes happy, as well as minute; and there is a tone of moral purity and rational plety in his thoughts, enriched by the legendary lore of romance, that renders many passages of his poem [Saynt Werburge] exceedingly interesting."—*Dibdin's Typ. Bradstreet, Anne, 1613-1672, daughter of Thomas Dudley, Governor of Massachusetts, was a native of Northampton, England. At the age of 16 she married Simon Bradstreet, and accompanied him to America in 1630. Her husband became Governor of Massachusetts in 1680. Among the descendants of Mrs. Bradstreet who have risen to distinction, is RICHARD H. DANA, (q. v.) the well-known American author. The first collection of Mrs. Bradstreet's poems was pub. in 1640, under the title of Several Poems, compiled with great variety of Wit and Learning, full of delight; wherein especially is contained a compleat Discourse and Description of the Four Elements, Constitutions, Ages of Man, and Seasons of the Year, together with an exact Epitome of the Three First Monarchies, viz.: The Assyrian, Persian, and Grecian; and the beginning of the Roman Commonwealth to the end of their last King, with divers other Pleasant and Serious Poems: by a Gentlewoman of New England. This vol. was reprinted in London under the "Tenth Muse, lately sprung up in America," prefixed to the title. A second American edition, from the press of John Foster, Boston, in 1678:

"Corrected by the author, and enlarged by the addition of several other poems found among her papers after her death."

Mrs. Bradstreet's poems bear evidence of an intimate acquaintance with, and great admiration of, "Great Bartsa's" sugared lines." Sylvester's trans. of the Divine Weeks of Du Bartsa had introduced this poet to a large circle of English admirers.

Mrs. Bradstreet thus expresses her admiration of the Soldier-Poet:

"But when my wandering eyes and envious heart
 Great Bartsa's sugared lines do but read o'er,
 Fool! I do grudge the muses did not part
 Twixt him and me their over-fluent store.
 A Bartsa can do what a Bartsa will—
 But simple I, according to my skill."

Nathaniel Ward, the author of The Simple Cobbler of Agawam, would have us to understand that, whatever might be Mrs. Bradstreet's opinion in the premises, yet Apollo was not by any means satisfied of the unquestionable precedence of Du Bartsa:

"Mercury showed Apollo Bartsa's book,
 Minerva this, and wished him well to look
 And tell uprightly which did which excel,
 He viewed and viewed and vowed he could not tell."
 See Griswold's Female Poets of America.

More distinguished authorities than Ward vied in celebrating Mrs. Bradstreet's poetical effusions.

Dr. Cotton Mather considered her works to be
 "A monument to her memory, beyond the stateliest marble."—Magnalia

"Your only hand those poesies did compose;
 Your head the source whence all these springs did flow."
 JOHN ROBERTS: President of Harvard College.
 "Now I believe Tradition, which doth call
 The Muses, Virtues, Graces, females all:
 Only they are not nine, eleven, nor three:—
 Our authorism proves them but one unity."

BENJAMIN WOODBRIDGE, first graduate of Harvard College.

"One unity:" is it possible? How strange!
 John Norton describes this "peerless gentlewoman, the mirror of her age and glory of her sex:
 "Praise her who list, yet he shall be a debtor,
 For art ne'er feigned, nor nature formed, a better."

"These praises run into hyperbole, and prove, perhaps, that their authors were more gallant than critical: but we perceive from Mrs. Bradstreet's poems that they are not destitute of imagination, and that she was thoroughly instructed in the best learning of the age."—R. W. GILWOLD.

In the height of enthusiasm, good John Norton goes so far as to declare, that if Virgil could hear her works, he would condemn his own to the flames. As the Mantuan Bard is not likely to be gratified by hearing Mrs. Bradstreet's effusions, it is idle to discuss the position assumed by Norton, and argue whether Virgil would or would not be capable of such an act of philanthropic abnegation, or ebullition of disappointed rivalry, as the combustion of his verses would display to the eyes of an astonished and mourning world. Miserable as Virgil's effusions may be, when compared with the verses of Mrs. Bradstreet, yet somehow we have become accustomed to him, and could better spare a better poet,—even the famed "Tenth Muse" herself.

Bradwardin, Bradwardine, or Bredwardine, Thomas, an English schoolman of the 14th century, known as the "Profound Doctor," was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury in 1349, and died a few weeks afterwards. He was of Merton College, Oxford, and one of the Proctors of that University in 1325. Astronomical Tables in MS. in the possession of Sir Henry Savile. Geometria Speculativa, cum Arithmetica speculativa, Paris, 1495-1504, fol. Arithmetica, printed separately in 1502; other editions of both, 1512-30. De Proportionibus, Paris, 1495; Venice, 1505, fol. De Quadratura Circuli, Paris, 1495, fol. De Causa Dei contra Pelagium, et de Virtute Causarum libri tres; ex editione Henrici Savillii, Lon., 1618, fol. This refutation of Pelagianism is Bradwardine's principal work, and gained him great renown.

"As Bradwardine was a very excellent mathematician, he endeavoured to treat theological subjects with a mathematical accuracy; was the first divine, as far as I know, says Sir Henry Savile, who pursued that method. The book against Pelagianism is one regular connected series of reasoning from principle, or conclusions which have been demonstrated before."

"Accused by the Catholics as holding out the same doctrine which has since been termed Protestantism."—DR. ADAM CLARK.

"It is a surprising work for the age in which it appeared."—BUCKLESTERN.

Brainard, John G. C., 1796-1828, an American poet of considerable note, was a native of New London, Connecticut. He graduated at Yale College in 1815, and then commenced the practice of the law at Middletown, Conn. A volume of his poems, consisting partly of his contributions to the Connecticut Mirror, which he edited for five years, was pub. in 1825, and very favourably received. This volume contained but little more than half of the poetry comprised in the third edition. An edit. was pub. in 1832, which contains an account of his life by John G. Whittier, an intimate friend. A number of pieces in this volume were not the compositions of Brainard. The last edition of his works, pub. in 1842, (Hartford, 16mo,) gives us some insight into his career as a Newspaper Editor—that Sisyphus of modern days.

"He failed only in his humorous pieces; in all the rest his language is appropriate and pure, his diction free and harmonious, and his sentiments natural and sincere. His serious poems are characterized by deep feeling and delicate fancy; and if we had no records of his history, they would show that he was a man of great gentleness, simplicity, and purity."—R. W. GANSWOLD.

With an Appendix relative to Indian Affairs, Edin., 1765, 8vo. A new edit. of his Memoirs was pub. in 1822, by Sereno Edwards Dwight, including his Journal. Mr. Edwards had omitted the already printed Journals, which had been pub. in two parts; the first from June 19th to Nov. 4, 1745, entitled Mirabilia Dei inter Indicos; the second from Nov. 24 to June 19, 1746, under the title Divine Grace Displayed, &c. Mr. Dwight has incorporated those journals in a regular chronological series with the rest of the Diary as above given by Edwards.

His friend, President Edwards, declares that he "Never knew his equal of his age and standing, for clear, accurate notions of the nature and essence of true religion, and its distinctions from its various false appearances."

Archbishop Bramhall was a man of great energy of character, and highly esteemed by his contemporaries. During the Civil War he resided chiefly abroad. An answer to Milton's Defensio Populi was attributed to him, but Mr. Todd disproves the charge in his Life of Milton.

"Perhaps the most valuable part of his works is that in which he contended with Hobbes. He argued with great acuteness against Hobbes's notions on liberty and necessity, in the Catching of the Leviathan, in which he undertakes to demonstrate, out of Hobbes's own works, that no sincere Hobbiist can be a good Christian, or a good Commonwealth's man, or reconcile himself to himself."

Braithwait, Braithwaite, Brathwaite, or Braithwayte, Richard, 1588-1673, a native of Warcop, Westmoreland, was entered of Oriel College, Oxford, at the age of 16.

"He avoided as much as he could the rough paths of logic and philosophy, and traced those smooth ones of poetry and Roman history, in which at length he did excel."—Athen. Oxon.

He subsequently removed to Cambridge,

"Where he spent some time for the sake of dead and living authors."

He settled down into an office in the militia, and a substantial county magistrate. An excellent example to poets, who are not always of the most sedate kind. The Golden Pleece, Lon., 1611, 8vo. Barnabee's Itinerarium, or Barnabee's Journall, with a Life of the Author, &c., by Joseph Haslewood, Lon., 1820, 12mo, 2 vols., 125 copies printed. Mr. Haslewood had a good claim to the editorial honour of this work, as he traced it to its author.

"Haslewood hit the right nail upon the head when he found out the real author of Barnaby, in Richard Brathwait; from the unvarying designation of 'On the Errata,' at the end of Brathwait's pieces, which is observable in that of his Drunken Barnaby's Tour. . . . The late Mr. Heber used to shout aloud, 'Stick to that, Haslewood, and your fame is fixed.' . . . His edition of Barnaby's Tour exhibited the rare spectacle of an accurate Latin (as well as English) text, by an individual who did not know the dative singular from the dative plural of hic, hæc, hoc!"—Dublin's Bibliomania.

For other pieces of Brathwait's, see Lowndes's Bibliog. Manual; consult Athen. Oxon.; Censura Literaria; Biog. Dramat.; Warton's Hist. Eng. Poetry; Ellis's Specimens.

"Brathwait's merits are undoubtedly very considerable. Some of his pieces are capable of affording instruction and delight. He was a most extraordinary man in poetry and in prose."—DIBDIN.

Anthony Wood does not give so favourable an opinion: "He wrote and published several works in English, consisting of prose and poetry, highly commended in the age wherein published, but since slighted and despised as frivolous matters and only to be taken into the hands of novices."—Athen. Oxon.

Dr. Bliss makes a large addition to Anthony's list of Brathwait's pieces.

"The plan of this work was suggested by Mr. Southey, and the writer has laboured with no small diligence. We are indebted to Mrs. Bray for many pleasant hours from her clever works."—Lon. Athenæum.

For the production of this work, Mrs. B., as the daughter-in-law of Stothard, possessed peculiar advantages.

"A more beautiful volume than this, is not often issued. The numerous illustrations have been chosen with a sedulous respect for the reputation of the graceful artist whose life was in his works; and they have been rendered with most delicate care, there being something in the nature of Stothard's genius which lent itself, with more than ordinary adaptability, to this form of presentation."—*Lon. "To describe in detail Mrs. Bray's works, or criticise minutely their merits, would be superfluous. Brett, Samuel, "Captain of a ship of Malta, against the Turks, in assistance to the Venetians," published a most interesting pamphlet, Lon., 1655, 4to, giving an account of his Observations in his Travels beyond the Seas, including A Narrative of the Proceedings of a great Council of Jews, assembled in the Plain of Ageda, in Hungary, about thirty leagues distant from Buda, to examine the Scriptures concerning Christ, on the Twelfth of October, 1650. By Samuel Brett, there present.

"At the Place above named, there assembled about three hundred Rabbies, called together from several Parts of the World to examine the Scriptures concerning Christ. . . . The King of Hungary did allow that some Assistants should be sent from Rome; and their Coming thither did prove a great unhappiness to this hopeful Council."

On the seventh day of the Council, they called in to their aid six of the Roman Clergy, "sent by the Pope to assist in this Council." The instructions of the priests were not at all relished by the Jews, for

"As soon as the Assembly had heard these Things from them, they were generally and exceedingly troubled thereat, and fell into high Clamours against them and their Religion, crying out, No Christ, no Woman-God, no Intercession of Saints, no Worshipping of Images, no Praying to the Virgin Mary, &c. Truly their Trouble heretofore was so great, that it troubled me to see their Impatience; they rent their Cloaths and cast Dust upon their Heads, and cried out, Blasphemy, Blasphemy! and, upon this, the Council broke up. . . . I do believe there were many Jews there, that would have been persuaded to own the Lord Jesus; and this I assure you for a Truth, and it is for the Honour of our Religion, and the Encouragement of our Divines, one eminent Rabbi there did deliver his Opinion, in Conference with me, that he at first feared that those which were sent from Rome would cause an unhappy Period to their Council; and professed to me, that he much desired the Presence of some Protestant Divines, and especially of our English Divines, of whom he had a better Opinion than of any other Divines in the World."

This very curious pamphlet was reprinted in vol. i. of The Harleian Miscellany, and vol. i. of The Phoenix, p. 543.

Brett, Thomas, 1667-1743, a native of Bettishanger, Kent, admitted of Queen's College, Cambridge, 1684, and Corpus Christi, 1689; Rector of Bettishanger, 1703, and of Ruckings, 1705; received into communion with the Non-jurors, 1715. He was a voluminous writer of controversial pieces. His Dissertation on the Principal Liturgies used by the Christian Church in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, pub. 1720, has been highly commended.

"No man can seriously peruse the writings of Brett relative to the Liturgies of the Primitive Churches, without being impressed with the importance of the subject."—Hidden on Tradition.

His Collection of the different Liturgies, with a Dissertation on them, also appeared in 1720. In 1743 was pub. his Letter to a Clergyman, showing why our English Bibles differ so much from the Septuagint, though both are translated from the Hebrew Original, 8vo. "Dr. Brevint was well read in the Eucharistic Sacrifice; no man understood it better; which may appear from two tracts of his upon the subject, small ones both, but extremely fine. He stood upon the ancient ground, looked upon evangelical duties as the true oblation and sacrifice, resolved the sacrifice of the Eucharist, actively considered, solely into them; and he explained the practical uses of that doctrine in so clear, so lively, and so affecting a way, that we shall scarce meet with any thing on the subject that can justly be thought to exceed it, or even come up to it. I could heartily join my wishes with a late learned writer that that excellent little book, entitled The Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice, might be reprinted for the honour of God, and the benefit of the Church."

Winstanley and Phillips make him the writer of six plays. Kirkman, Jacob, and Gildon allow him but two. Langbaine denies Winstanley's assertion that Lingua, or the Combat of the Tongue and the Five Senses for Superiority, 1607, 4to, was written by Brewer. This piece has become famous from the story that "At the first performance of this play at Trinity College, Cambridge, Oliver Cromwell personated the part of Tactus, from which he first imbibed his ambitious sentiments."

Brewster, Celestia A., born 1812 in Mass. Bloss's Ancient History and Heroines of the Crusades, &c.

Brewster, Sir David, LL.D. and K.H., one of the most distinguished of modern experimental philosophers, was born at Jedburgh, Scotland, Dec. 11, 1781. He studied at the University of Edinburgh, where he became intimate with Dugald Stewart, Playfair, and Robison. In 1808 he undertook the editorship of the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, which was not completed until 1830. He received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Aberdeen in 1807, and in 1808 was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. In 1813 he pub. his Treatise on New Philosophical Instruments. In conjunction with Professor Jameson, in 1819, he established the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal; this work contains contributions by Herschel, Humboldt, Blumenbach, Prout, and other eminent philosophers. Subsequently Sir David commenced the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal, of which 16 vols. appeared. In 1815 the Institute of France elected Dr. Brewster a corresponding member, and he has been similarly honoured by the Royal Academies of Russia, Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark. In 1831 he received the decoration of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order, and in 1832 he was knighted by William IV. A higher honour was in reserve for him: by the death of Berzelius, a vacancy occurred in the number (never more than eight) of the Foreign Associate Members of the National Institute of France.—Sir David was elected.

"The eight associate members of the Institute are generally regarded as the eight greatest officers in the learned world."—Le France.

Sir David's first wife was a daughter of the celebrated Macpherson, the editor—or author, as opinions vary—of Osian.

"Sir David Brewster's numerous writings take in a wide range of science. His most valuable scientific papers are published in the 'Transactions' of the Royal Societies of London and of Edinburgh. Among the more important are: 1. On a new Analysis of Solar light, indicating three primary colours, forming coincident spectra of equal length. 2. On Circular Polarization. 3. On the Effects of Compression and Dilatation in altering the polarizing structure of the doubly refracting crystals; and others, in which the law is determined which connects the refractive index of a crystal with its angle of polarization, and the discovery of rings in biaxial crystals is made known. Other papers are to be found in the Edinburgh Rev., the Reports of the British Association, the Lib. of Useful Knowledge, the Phil. Mag., (of which Sir David is one of the editors,) and the North Brit. Rev.: they embrace physical geography, astronomy, photography, meteorology, &c. Of separate works may be mentioned: 4. A Treatise on the Kaleidoscope, 1819, 8vo. 5. Notes to Robison's System of Mechanical Philosophy, 1822, 4 vols., 8vo. 6. Euler's Letters; with a Life of Euler, 1823, 2 vols., 12mo. 7. Notes and Introductory Chapter to Legendre's Elements of Geometry, 1824. 8. Treatise on Optics, 1831, 8vo. American edition, by Prof. A. D. Bache, Phila., 1833, 12mo. 9. Letters on Natural Magic, 1831, 12mo. 10. Life of Sir Isaac Newton, 1831, 12mo. 11. The Martyrs of Science; or, The Lives of Galileo, Tycho Brahe, and Kepler, 1841, 12mo, (2d ed., 8vo, 1846.) 12. Treatise on the Microscope, p. 8vo. 13. More Worlds than One: the Creed of the Philosopher, and the Hope of the Christian, 1854, 8vo. 14. Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton, 1855, 2 vols., 8vo." See Knight's Eng. Cyc., Div. Biog., vol. i.

"Dr. Brewster's book [Life of Newton] is a most scientific and interesting one: there is instruction for the ignorant, learning for the learned, science for the profound, and anecdotes personal and scientific for the idler and the gossip. All that can be now known of the illustrious Newton is told with considerable clearness and beauty; his discoveries are discussed, his inventions described, the character of the most eminent of his companions drawn, and we follow him to the observatory, the study, the Royal Society, and the private chamber. It is a work which affords much instruction and pleasure."—Lon. Athenæum. (Review of 1st ed.)

The Memoirs of Sir Isaac Newton, 1855, 2 vols., 8vo, has not passed without censure. See NEWTON, SIR ISAAC. We should not omit to notice the valuable article on Magnetism in the 7th edit. of the Encyc. Brit.

The Lives of Galileo, Tycho Brahe, and Kepler, the Martyrs of Science, have been commended. A late martyr of science, in noticing one of Sir David's last works, paid the following handsome tribute to the venerable author:

"The sale of a work is usually no bad test of the interest which attaches to the subject of it; and we accept it as good evidence, that the question respecting the 'plurality of worlds,' so ingeniously discussed by Sir David Brewster and his anonymous antagonist, is one which successfully addresses itself to at least the curiosity of the reading portion of the community, that Sir David's More Worlds than One, though not yet six months before the public, is already in what is more than tantamount to its third edition. The sale of the third thousand of his separate Treatise is, we are informed, fast progressing; and his article on the same subject in the North British Review, which formed the pregnant nucleus of the work, is understood to have enjoyed at least an equal circulation. There does certainly exist a wide-spread desire to know, so far as can be known, the extent of God's living, responsible creation. The planet which we inhabit is but one vessel in the midst of a fleet sailing on through the vast ocean of space, under convoy of the sun. Far on the distant horizon what seem to be a great many other convoy ships appear, though such is their remoteness, that even our best glasses enable us to know very little regarding them. But in the vessels of the same group as ourselves, we see evolutions similar to those which our own ship performs—we see them maintain relations similar to our own to the great guardian vessel in the midst—we see them regulated by her in all their movements, and that when nights fall dark, most of them have their sets of lanterns hoisted up to give them light; and there is a desire among us to know somewhat respecting the crews of these neighbour-vessels of ours, and whether—as we all seem bound on a common voyage—the expedition, as it is evidently under one and the same control, may not have a common purpose or object to accomplish. Such is the natural, and surely not irrational, curiosity that has led in part to the extensive circulation of the two recently published works which discuss the question on its opposite sides; though in perhaps equal part, however, their popularity must be owing to the admirable manner in which they are written, and the high scientific acquirements of their respective authors. It is not every day that combatants such as Sir David Brewster, and, shall we say, Professor Whewell, meet in the arena. There is a pleasing peculiarity in the writings of our great countryman, which our readers must have often remarked.

"We referred on a recent occasion to the remark of Sir James Mackintosh, that 'the memorable instances of Cicero and Milton, and still more those of Dryden and Burke, seem to show that there is some natural tendency in the fire of genius to burn more brightly or to blaze more fiercely in the evening than in the morning of human life.' We can, however, regard none of these instances, nor yet that of Dugald Stewart, which Sir James also adduces, as equally striking with the one furnished by the literary history of Sir David. The poet who produced, while yet a boy, the Hymn of the Nativity, did not leave himself much room for future improvement, in at least poetic feeling and conception; and in the earlier writings of Dryden and Burke, we find no equivocal promise of what was afterwards to be accomplished in the Ode to St. Cecilia's Day, and the Reflections on the French Revolution. In the earlier compositions of Sir David, on the other hand—always severe in style, and sternly scientific in form—there is comparatively little indication of that rich flow of fancy and imagination, and that fertility of happy illustration, which his later writings exhibit. As in the far west, his year of life enjoys an 'Indian summer' greatly richer and more gorgeous in its scenery than any of the seasons that have gone before. There is something inexpressably pleasing in exhibitions of this kind. A vigorous and still youthful mind lodged in a material framework which has served its purposes during the ordinary term of life, and gives evidence that, though age presses upon it but lightly, his touch is there, is of itself an argument for the immortality of the better part. Were soul and body to perish together, they would surely exhibit traces of the same decay. Further, too, it is a singularly agreeable sight, as illustrative of that happiest condition of advanced life, which the Psalmist could describe as peculiarly the gift of God to his own. In old age, when others failed and faded, the righteous man was still to bring forth fruit and blossom, as in his fresh and vigorous years. There was to be sap and fitness in his unshrivelled trunk, and green leaves and bright flowers on all his boughs."—HUGH MILLAR: Edinburgh Witness.

Bridferth, flourished 980, a British monk, and the most eminent mathematician of his day, was a teacher of the school at Ramsey.

"Bridferth's Commentaries, on the two treatises of Bede, D. Natura Rerum, and De Temporum Ratione, are extremely valuable for the light they throw on the method of teaching in the Anglo-Saxon schools. They are probably nothing more than notes on the lectures delivered in the school at Ramsey. Bede's Treatises were still the text-books of the Anglo-Saxon scholars."

Bridferth left comments on the tracts De Indigitatione and De Ratione Unciarum, published under the name of Bede. Pitts attributes to him De Principiis Mathematicis, lib. 1., and De Institutione Monachorum, lib. 1.; and Maillon gives him credit for the MS. Life of Dunstan, printed in the Acta Sanctorum, tom. iv. 1685. This opinion is generally concurred in: Bridferth's Commentaries will be found in some editions of Bede's works; Colon. Agrip., 1612, tom. i. &c. See Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.; Pitts's De Illustribus, &c.

Bridge, William, 1600–1690, an eminent Puritan divine, was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. He preached for a time at Norwich, but being silenced for Nonconformity, went to Rotterdam, where he took charge of a congregation. In 1642 he returned to England, became minister of Great Yarmouth, whence he was ejected in 1662. He was also a member of the Westminster Assembly. Archbishop Laud thus refers to him.

"In Norwich, one Mr. Bridge, rather than he would conform, hath left his lecture, and two cures, and is gone into Holland. On the margin of this passage, Charles I. wrote: 'Let him go; we are well rid of him!'"—Laud's Troubles and Trials.

Bridge pub. Sermons, 1641, '68, '71, '73; a Reply to Dr. Teme, 1643, 4to. Life of Jessy, 1671, 8vo. His principal works appeared in 1657, 2 vols. 4to. In 1845 his Works, now first collected, were pub. in 5 vols. 8vo; containing above 100 sermons. Among the most noted of his discourses were nine sermons, entitled Seasonable Truths in Evil Times, 1648, 8vo.

His sermons on Faith were highly recommended by the Countess of Huntingdon. Bridge was very studious in his habits.

"He possessed a library well furnished with the fathers, schoolmen, and critics. He was a very close student rising every morning, both in winter and summer, at four o'clock, and continuing in his library until eleven."

Bridges, John, b. about 1666, d. 1724, an eminent antiquary, about 1719 began to make Collections towards a History of Northamptonshire. He collected enough materials to fill 30 folio, 5 4to, and 5 small volumes. He died before he was ready for the press, and the MSS. were placed in the hands of Dr. Samuel Jebb, who pub. Parts 1, 2, and a portion of No. 3, 1737, &c. The work was stopped at the press by want of means and other difficulties, and it was not until 1791 that the History appeared, edited by the Rev. Bridgewater, Rev. Francis Henry Egerton. eighth Earl of, 1756–1829, was educated at Eton, and All Souls' College, Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1780. His father, the Bishop of Durham, appointed him a Prebendary of Durham in 1780, and in 1781 the Duke of Bridgewater presented him to the rectory of Middle in Shropshire, and in 1797 to that of Whitchurch in the same county. In 1823 he succeeded his brother in his titles. For many years before his death he resided entirely at Paris. In 1796 he pub. in 4to an edit. of the Hippolytus of Euripides. He also edited a Fragment of an Ode of Sappho from Longinus, and an Ode of Sappho from Dionysius Halicarn., in 8vo. In 1793 he prepared for the Biographia Britannica a Life of Lord Chancellor Egerton, (see vol. V.) 250 copies of this Memoir, considerably enlarged, were privately printed by him in 1798. This enlarged memoir, and a life of the Bishop of Durham, were intended by the publishers, at the author's request, for the 6th vol. of the Biog. Brit. His lordship pub. several other pieces: see Memoir in Gent. Mag. He left his collections of MSS. and antiquities, and a sum of money, to the Brit. Museum. The earl had been deeply impressed with the value of well-digested argumentative treatises upon the subject of man's relations to his Maker. He himself drew up a work upon the subject, which was privately printed at Paris, by Didot. By his last Will and Testament, he bequeathed the sum of eight thousand pounds sterling to be paid to the person or persons who should be appointed by the President of the Royal Society to prepare a work

"On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation. Illustrating such work by all reasonable arguments: as, for instance, the variety and formation of God's creatures in the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms; the effect of digestion, and thereby of conversion; the construction of the hand of man, and an infinite variety of other arguments: as also by discoveries, ancient and modern, in arts, sciences, and in the whole extent of literature."

One thousand copies were to be printed, and the profits were to be paid to the author or authors selected for this important duty. The following gentlemen were honoured by the appointment, it being determined to publish eight separate essays:

1. The Rev. Thomas Chalmers, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh, On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God as manifested in the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man. (2 vols. 8vo; 6th edit., 1840.)

2. John Kidd, M.D., F.R.S., Regius Professor of Medicine in the University of Oxford, On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Physical Condition of Man. (8vo; 5th edit., 1837.)

3. The Rev. William Whewell, M.A., F.R.S., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Astronomy and General Physics considered with reference to Natural Theology. (8vo; 7th edit., 1839.)

4. Sir Charles Bell, K.G.H., F.R.S., L. & E., The Hand: its Mechanism and Vital Endowments as evincing Design. (8vo; 4th edit., 1837.)

5. Peter Mark Roget, M.D., Fellow and Secretary of the Royal Society, On Animal and Vegetable Physiology, considered with reference to Natural Theology. (2 vols. 8vo; 3d edit., 1840.)

6. The Rev. William Buckland, D.D., F.R.S., Canon of Christ Church, and Professor of Geology in the University of Oxford, On Geology and Mineralogy. (2 vols. 8vo; 2d edit., 1837.)

7. The Rev. William Kirby, M.A., F.R.S., On the History, Habits, and Instincts of Animals. (2 vols. 8vo; 2d edit., 1835.)

8. William Prout, M.D., F.R.S., Chemistry, Meteorology, and the Function of Digestion, considered with reference to Natural Theology. (8vo; 3d edit., 1845.)

In all, 12 volumes. The names of the above writers are a sufficient guarantee of the value of their respective essays. Great fault has been found with the manner in which the trust has been discharged:

"Such a bequest is without parallel in the history of our literature, but, unfortunately, the intention of the munificent nobleman has been absolutely perverted. Instead of one distinct work on Natural Theology, which would have been translated into every written language, and which would have formed a more than European monument to the liberality and piety of our countryman, eight independent treatises have appeared, and to them the favoured publisher has affixed such exorbitant prices as to prevent the less wealthy classes of society from benefiting by his lordship's generosity."

So argues an indignant objector. Perhaps much might be said on the other side, but as we have no space for discussion, we will only refer the reader to the Edinburgh Review, Lon. Quarterly Review, Westminster Review, Fraser's Magazine, the Athenæum, &c. A new ed. of the Bridgewater Treatises, thoroughly revised and improved, has been pub. by Mr. Bohn in his Scientific Library. The so-called Ninth Bridgewater Treatise, a Fragment, by Charles Babbage, was pub. 1837.

Bridgewater, John, d. about 1600, who in his writings calls himself Aqua Pontanus, was entered of Hart Hall, Oxford, and there removed to Brasenose College. He was chosen Rector of Lincoln College in 1563, Archdeacon of Rochester, 1570. Becoming favourable to Romanism, he resigned his preferments, and sought a home in the college for English Roman Catholics at Douay. He died in Germany. Concertatio Ecclesiarum Catholicarum in Anglia. Conveyances, being Select Precedents of Deeds and Instruments concerning the most considerable Estate in England, Lon., 1652, '82, '99, 1710; 5th ed., 1725, in 2 parts, fol.

"His draughts are still admired and resorted to by all who deem a propriety of composition and copiousness of diction not incompatible with technical accuracy. Unfortunately, they are given to the public in a very slovenly manner; and the great inferiority of some to the rest affords also too much reason to fear that there has been much interpolation." See Williams's Study of the Law.

Judgment of the Common Pleas in Benyon v. Evelyn, T. T. 14, chap. ii., &c., extracted from Bridgman's Report by F. Hargrave, Lon., 1811, 8vo. Reports of Judgments by Sir Orlando Bridgman, &c., edit. from the Hargrave MSS. by S. Bannister, Lon., 1823, 8vo. Sir O. B. left 9 vols. of MS. Reports; the above vol. is an extract from four vols. of his notes of cases, &c. Sir Orlando enjoyed a great reputation as a lawyer.

"Very eminent in the knowledge of the law."—LORD CLARENDON.
 "He should not be mentioned but with reverence and with veneration for his learning and integrity."—LORD NOTTINGHAM.

"A very studious gentleman, who had an account brought to him of all that passed in the courts."—LORD HOLT.

"In the arguments of Chief Justice Bridgman, methinks I find that evocatio cause, as the Roman orator calls it, an exact anatomy of the case, and dextrous piercing into the very bowels of it; and it was no small commendation of an eminent professor of our law, and one that afterwards was advanced to the highest office a person of that profession can be capable.—That he always argued like a lawyer and a gentleman."—Pref. to Carter's Reports.

"Mr. Foulbrique [Treat. on Equity] speaks of Bridgman's Reports, of which Mr. Hargrave had lent him the MS., as far exceeding Carter's in copiousness, depth, and correctness."

Reflections on the Study of the Law, 1804, 8vo. A Short View of Legal Bibliography, Lon., 1807, 8vo.

"Mr. Bridgman's Treatise, though incomplete, is the best English work existing of the period embraced by his Legal Bibliography. The author's study must have led him to a familiar acquaintance with the Reports, from which we might have expected a more enduring and satisfactory monument of research and criticism upon them than this volume affords. This deficiency, so far as regards the older reporters, has recently been adequately supplied by the very judicious and able criticism and notes of Mr. J. W. Wallace in a work entitled, The Reporters chronologically arranged, &c."—Marrin's Leg. Bib.

The second edition of Wallace's Reporters was pub. in Philadelphia, 1845. The third edition, almost entirely rewritten, much extended and enlarged, was pub. Philadelphia, 1855, 8vo.

The other "author in part" of Religio Bibliopolæ is supposed to have been no less a person than that odd member of the profession, John—not "glorious John"—but gossiping John, himself. But the authorship of this work has been attributed to another person.

Briggs, Charles F., b. at Nantucket, resides in New York, has gained some celebrity as the author of Harry Franco, a Tale of the Great Panic, 2 vols. 1837. The Haunted Merchant, 1843. Working a Passage, or Life in a Liner, 1844. The Trippings of Tom Pepper, an Autobiography. In connection with Mr. John Biscoe he originated The Broadway Journal, and for some time he had the editorial charge of Putnam's Monthly Magazine, New York. Mr. B. has also some pretensions to artistic taste. Some of his opinions upon pictures will be found in The Broadway Journal.

"Mr. Briggs has evinced both wit and humour of a high order in his Harry Franco, and other novels and sketches."—R. W. Griswold.

Briggs, Henry, 1556-1630, an eminent mathematician, a native of Warley Wood, near Halifax, Yorkshire, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow in 1588; examiner and lecturer in Mathematics in 1592; first Professor of Geometry in Gresham College, London, 1598; first Savilian Professor of Geometry, 1619. At Oxford he settled himself at Merton College, and between his lectures and studies passed a most studious life. His interest in Lord Napier's discovery of logarithms was evinced by his conference with his lordship respecting an alteration of the scale, and his valuable publications on the subject. Logarithmorum Ohilias prima, Lon., 1617, 8vo. Arithmetica Logarithmica, &c., Lon., 1624, fol.; enlarged, printed under the care of Adrian Vlacq, in French, Gonda, 1628, fol. In English, Lon., 1633, fol. This great work contains the logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers, to 14 places of figures beside the index! Briggs died before this work was perfected as he designed; but his friend Henry Gellibrand brought it to completion in 1633, under the title of Trigonometria Britannica, &c., Gonda, fol. Briggs pub. some other mathematical works, and A Treatise of the North-West Passage to the South Sea, Lon., 1652, 4to.; reprinted in Purchas's Pilgrims, vol. iii. 852. Among the sons of English mathematical science, it is doubtful if there have arisen a greater than Henry Briggs. The illustrious Isaac Barrow, the learned Dr. Smith, the profound Gataker and Oughtred concur in celebrating the praises of the "mirror of the age for his excellent skill in Geometry."

Bristed, Rev. John, 1778–1855, b. Dorsetshire, Eng., son of a clergyman of the Established Church, and father of C. A. Bristed, (ante.) Educated at Winchester Coll. and studied Medicine at Edinburgh. For two years a pupil in the law-office of the celebrated Mr. Chitty. In 1820 he became Rector of St. Michael's Church, Bristol, R.I., having succeeded Bishop Griswold. A Pedestrian Tour through part of the Highlands of Scotland in 1801, Lon., 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. The Resources of the United States of America, &c., New York, 1818, 8vo; reprinted in London under the title of America and her Resources, &c., 1818, 8vo.

"Mr. Bristed's 'eight years' have, we fear, been spent to very little purpose, if they have not been more profitable to himself than his 'voluminous masses of materials relating to our Federal Republic,' are likely to be to the world. He has certainly, however, improved, both in style and matter, since we made our first acquaintance with him as an author, which it was our fortune to do some years since, in the character of a pedestrian traveller into the Highlands of Scotland. . . . We conclude with declaring, that however valuable a citizen may have been acquired in Mr. Bristed, and however zealous he may be for the interest of his adopted country, it is our sincere hope, that this, his intellectual offspring, may always be considered alien from our literary community."—North American Review, vii. 1818.

"We cannot avoid regarding Mr. Bristed with some degree of respect. His struggles are evident. In writing his book, his pride in his native country, which all his republicanism has been unable to overcome, has frequently had to contend with the flattering but unsubstantial prospect with which the prophetic folly that ever accompanies democracy has impressed his mind to a degree almost equalling that of the vain people with whom he is domiciled." &c.—Lon. Brocklesby, Richard, M.D., 1722-1797, the generous friend of Samuel Johnson and Edmund Burke, deserves ever to be held in honoured remembrance. Some of his profess. essays will be found in Phil. Trans. Abr., 1747, '55, and in Med. Obs. and Inq., 1767. He pub. an Essay concerning the Mortality of the Horned Cattle, Lon., 1746, 8vo. Economical and Med. Observations, 1764, 8vo, and some other works.

"As an instance of extraordinary liberality, Johnson told us that Dr. Brocklesby had upon this occasion [his contemplated journey to Italy, for the restoration of his health] offered him a hundred [pounds] a year for his life. A grateful tear started into his eye, as he spoke this in a faltering tone."—Boswell.

He also urged Dr. Johnson to live with him, that he might have him continually under his care.

"My physician in ordinary is Dr. Brocklesby, who comes almost every day."—Johnson to Mrs. Thrale, London, Oct. 6, 1783.

"The kind attention which you have so long shown to my health and happiness makes it as much a debt of gratitude as a call of interest to give you an account of what befalls me, when accident removes me from your immediate care. . . . You write to me with a seal that animates, and a tenderness that melts me."—Johnson to Brocklesby, a few months before Johnson's death.

This benevolent man had placed Edmund Burke's name in his will for £1000, but considering that Burke might die first, (which he did by five months,) he insisted upon presenting him with the money, which he did in the most handsome manner.

"That you may long live,—for talent an ornament to human kind, and for your country, your friends, and family, the same happy man in property, as you have ever approved yourself whilst withdrawn from the sunshine of a court—this, with much more, (if any thing can be better,) is the fervent wish of,

My dear Burke,

Brooke, Mrs. Charlotte, has gained considerable reputation by occasional poetical effusions.

Brooke was the "chamber fellow" at Lincoln's Inn and bosom friend of the celebrated Dr. Donne, and aided him in his clandestine marriage to the daughter of Sir George Moor, Chancellor of the Garter, and Lieutenant of the Tower. Brooke, John Charles, 1748–1794, Somerset Herald, was deeply versed in antiquarian lore. Some of his contributions will be found in Archæol., 1777, '79, '82. His signature in the Gent. Mag. was J. B. He rendered Brooke, N., M.D. Observations on Italy, Bath, 1797, 8vo.

Brooke, Ralph, d. 1625, York Herald, was originally named Brooke-worth. He is represented as most perverse and malicious in disposition, and he was a "thorn in the side" of the worthy Camden. He attacked the latter in a publication entitled A Discoverie of certain Errors in the much-commended Britannia, 1594. Very prejudicial to the descentes and successions of the ancient Nobilitie of this Realme; by Yorke Herault; sine anno; circa 1596, 4to. Second Discoverie of Errors prejudicial to noble descentes, with a Reply to Mr. Camden's Apologia ad Lectorem in his fifth edition, 1600. He presented this to K. James I., who prohibited its publication. Anstis pub. it in 1723, 4to; this vol. contains the original objections, Camden's reply, &c. The latter ably defended himself, and charged Brooke with ignorance and malice.

"Some early attempts were made by an envious person, one Brook, or Brookmonth, to blast the deservedly great reputation of this book; but they perished and came to nothing; as did likewise the terrible threats given out by Sir Symonds D'Ewes, that he would discover errors in every page."—Bisshop Nicolson: Reg. Libr. 1776, 4.

Our cholerick "Herault" completed in 1622 a valuable work, entitled Catalogue and Succession of the Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marquises, Earls, and Viscounts of this Realm of England, since the Norman Conquest to this present year, 1619, together with their arms, wives, and children, the times of their death and burials, with many of their memorable actions, Lon., 1619-22, fol. The felicitations of Yorke Herault over his new-born literary offspring were interrupted by a critic who made him remember his foray against the worthy Camden. Mr. Augustus Vincent borrowed even the very title of Brooke's indictment against the Britannia, and put forth A Discoverie of Errors in the first edition of the Catalogue of Nobility published by Ralph Brooke, Yorke Herald, Lon., 1622, fol. "A highly valuable work, though written with too much severity."

"This Abridgment, which is principally founded upon that of Fitzherbert, is digested under a greater number of titles, and besides the authorities collected by Fitzherbert, Brooke abridges a great number of readings, which seem to have fallen under his own knowledge as a judge and chief justice of the common pleas, and which are nowhere else extant, except in a small volume selected from this Abridgment, entitled New Cases."—WORMALL.

Brooks, James Gordon, 1801-1841, a native of Red Hook, near the city of New York, was known for some time as a contributor to periodicals under the signature of "Florio." His longest poem is entitled Genius; delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Yale College in 1827. Mr. and Mrs. Brooks pub. in 1829, a volume entitled The Rivals of Este, and other Poems, by James G. and Mary E. Brooks. The principal poem is the production of Mrs. Brooks.

Brooks, Maria, as styled by Southey, Maria del Occidente, b. about 1795, d. 1845, is best known as the author of Zophiel, or The Bride of Seven, the first canto of which was pub. in Boston, 1825; the whole work in London, 1833. Mrs. Brooks was the daughter of Mr. Gowen, a gentleman of Welsh descent, who settled at Medford, Massachusetts, where Maria was born. In 1820 she pub. a volume entitled Judith, Esther, and other poems, by a Lover of the Fine Arts. Mrs. Brooks passed the spring of 1831 in the hospitable mansion of Robert Southey, at Keswick, and this useful friend superintended the publication of Zophiel, of which he was a great admirer:

"If you have not seen Zophiel, it is well worth your reading, as by far the most original poem that this generation has produced. . . . The poem has attracted no notice: the chief cause of the present failure I suppose to be that it is not always perspicuously told. The diction is surprisingly good; indeed, America has never produced any poem to be compared with it."—Letter to Lord Mahon, May 12, 1834.

An interesting review of this poem will be found in Griswold's Female Poets of America. An edition of Zophiel was pub. in Boston in 1834, for the benefit of the Polish Exiles, in whose cause Mrs. Brooks felt the warmest interest. See Southey's Life and Correspondence.

In 1843 she printed for private circulation, Idomen, or The Vale of the Yumuri; a production which partakes much of the character of an autobiography. Mrs. Brooks inherited some estates in Cuba, and took up her residence in the island. She died at Matanzas, November 11, 1845.

Her principal poem will preserve her name from oblivion, but deals too little with human sympathies to take much hold of the public mind. It is one of those productions which will be always more quoted than read, and more admired than understood.

"Maria del Occidente is styled in The Doctor, &c., 'the most impassioned and most imaginative of all poetesses.' And without taking into account quadam ardorentiora scattered here and there throughout her singular poem, there is undoubtedly ground for the first clause, and, with the more accurate substitution of 'fanciful' for 'imaginative,' for the whole of the eulogy. It is altogether an extraordinary performance."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

Broome, William, d. 1745, a native of Cheshire, England, was educated at Eton, and at St. John's College. He was for some time rector in Sturston, in Suffolk. In conjunction with Osell and Oldisworth, he translated the Iliad into prose:

"This is the translation of which Osell boasted as superior, in Toland's opinion, to that of Pope: It has long since vanished, and is now in no danger from the critics."—DR. JOHNSON.

Pope engaged Fenton and Broome to aid him in the translation of the Odyssey, and to the share of the latter fell the 2d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 16th, 18th, and 23d books, together with all the notes. To Fenton's lot fell the 1st, 4th, 19th, and 20th. The other 12 books Pope translated himself. The associates did their work well:

"The readers of poetry have never been able to distinguish their books from those of Pope."

Broome did not consider himself liberally treated by Pope. It was said, that whilst Fenton received £300 for four books, Broome had but about £500 for eight books. The disappointed labourer charged his master with avarice; and Pope, with that petty spite which was his strongest characteristic, abused Broome in the Dunciad, and in the Bathos. Broome's Poems on several Occasions were pub., Lon., 1727, 8vo. In the Gent. Mag., under the signature of Chester, will be found some of his translations from Anacreon. He pub. Two Sermons, 1737, 4to.

Brougham, Henry, Lord, b. Sept. 1778, at Edinburgh, a descendant of one of the most ancient families of England, received his education at the High School and the University of his native city. He soon became distinguished for the zeal and success with which he pursued his mathematical studies. After leaving the University, he travelled for some time on the Continent, and on his return practised at the Bar in the city of Edinburgh until 1807, when he removed to London and was called to the Bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn. Three years afterwards he entered Parliament for the borough of Camelford and attached himself to the Whig opposition. In 1816 he represented the borough of Winchester. In 1820 occurred an event which was the means of placing Mr. Brougham in that commanding position before the public which he has ever since occupied. Caroline of Brunswick was arraigned before the House of Lords as a criminal, and Brougham was retained as her advocate. The great talents of the orator were employed in a cause calculated to elicit their noblest efforts, and, with a nation warmly enlisted in favour of his client, it is no marvel that he became the "popular idol." In 1830 he came in as Lord-Chancellor with Earl Grey, and retained his office about four years. Since that period the political life of his lordship is well known, and, indeed, hardly enters within the scope of our volume. Lord Brougham has been an eminent benefactor to the cause of literature and mental progress. In conjunction with Jeffrey, Murray, and Sydney Smith, he established in 1802 that most valuable periodical, The Edinburgh Review, and contributed many of the best articles in its pages. In 1821 he took a prominent part in the movement originated by Dr. Birkbeck for naturalising the Mechanics' Institutes in England. Of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge he was the principal founder, and is author of several of the treatises in the series, and of a number of the articles in its Penny Magazine. When only seventeen, he contributed to the Trans. of Roy. Soc. a paper on the Refraction and Reflection of Light. In the following year, 1797, he contributed another paper on the same subject, and, in 1798, a paper entitled General Theorems, chiefly Porisms in the Higher Geometry. In 1803 he pub. at Edinburgh his first work, in 2 vols. 8vo: The Colonial Policy of the European Powers. The greater part of this work relates to America, and gives a review of the policy of the Spanish, English, French, and Colonial administrations, Slavery, &c. "The vivacity, minute description, and kindly feeling everywhere apparent in this book, render it highly attractive."—Chamber's Cyclopaedia of Eng. Lit.

Broughton, Hugh, 1549-1612, celebrated for his proficiency in Hebrew and rabbinical learning, was a native of Oldbury, in the county of Salop. The celebrated Bernard Gilpin met a poor boy travelling on the Oxford road. He was surprised at his scholarship, had him instructed in his Houghton school, and in due time sent him to Cambridge, where he became Fellow of Christ College. This was the far-famed Hugh Broughton. Leaving college, and established in London as a preacher, he soon became noted. He still pursued his studies with such diligence as frequently to spend 16 hours out of the 24 at his books. We notice his principal works: A Concord of Scriptures, 1688. This work occupied the author several years; therefore he called it his little book of great pains. It treats of Scripture chronology and genealogy. It contains specimens by W. Rogers of the earliest copperplate engraving in England. Reprinted, 1620. See notice of a copy on vellum in Dibdin's Bibliomania, and in Lowndes's Bib. Manual, where will be found a list of Broughton's works. A Treatise of Melchisedech, proving him to be Sem, Lon., 1591, 4to. An Explication of the Article of Christ's Descent into Hell, 1599, 4to. This led to much controversy, in which Archbishop Whitgift and Bishop Bilson took part. Broughton, in pursuing the subject, addressed An Oration to the Genevians, which was first pub. in Greek at Mentz by Albinus, 1601, 8vo. In this he treats Beza with great severity. Exposition of Daniel, 1597, 4to. On Ecclesiastes, &c., 1609, 4to. Commentaries on Daniel, Haggai, 1607, 4to; the same in English, Bas, 1599, fol. The Translations of Jeremiah, 1608, 4to. Defence of a Concord of Scripture, 1609, 4to. Trans. of Job, 1610, 4to. Explanation of the Holy Apocalypse, 1610, 4to. Observations upon the first Ten Fathers, 1612, 4to. The celebrated Doctor Lightfoot pub. a collection of his works in 1662, fol., under the following title, The Works of the great Albionean Divine, renowned in many nations for rare skill in Salem's and Athen's Tongues, and familiar acquaintance with all Rabbinical learning, Mr. Hugh Broughton. The eulogy of the editor is most enthusiastic, and it is the praise of a master in Israel. Broughton, who played with Greek and Hebrew as a poet toys with the most familiar rhymes, trans. the Prophetic writings into Greek, and the Apocalypse into Hebrew. He was anxious to translate the whole of the N. Testament into Hebrew, believing that it would have forwarded the conversion of the Jews. He relates that a learned rabbi with whom he conversed, once said to him:

"Oh that you would set over all your New Testament into such Hebrew as you speak to me! you should turn all our nation."

It cannot be said that Broughton enjoyed a tranquil life; but Mr. Whitaker thinks his troubles were self-imposed:

"He was a writer of great ambition, vanity, and dogmatism, and as such was ridiculed more than once on the stage by Ben Jonson. It was his misfortune to offend both the High Church and the Calvinist party; but it must be confessed that all the evils of which he complained were brought on himself."—REV. J. W. WHITAKER.

Doubtless Mr. William Gilpin's unfavourable character of our author, in the Life of Bernard Gilpin, has led many to coincide with Mr. Whitaker's opinion; but Dr. Lightfoot's estimate is very different; and it has been well said that "Lightfoot lived nearer the time of Broughton than that gentleman; he had his information concerning him from those who were personally known to him; and must, therefore, be presumed to have had better opportunities of being acquainted with his real character."—Biog. Brit.

As to Ben Jonson's ridiculing him in his plays, that proves nothing more than that Broughton was extensively known, and had some peculiarities which made him a good subject for "Rare Ben." We need not remind the classical reader that some of the greatest sages of antiquity were impressed into the service of the drama against their own will. Dr. Lightfoot remarks,

"Some by the mere excitation of his books have set to the study of the Hebrew tongue and come to a very great measure of knowledge in it; nay, a woman might be named that hath done it."—Preface to Broughton's Works, 1662, fol.

Brown, Charles Brockden, 1771-1810, a native of Philadelphia, descended from ancestors who emigrated to Pennsylvania in the same ship which carried William Penn to his new colony, earned considerable distinction by the authorship of a number of novels of the Radcliffe or Godwin school. Wieland, or The Transformation, was pub. in 1798; in Lon., 1811. Ormond, or The Secret Witness, appeared in 1799; in Lon., 1811. This novel was not so successful as its predecessor. Arthur Mervyn, his next production, gives a graphic picture of the ravages of the yellow fever in Philadelphia. It was repub. in London in 1803. This was followed by Edgar Huntly, or The Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker, 1801; repub. in London in 1804. In this work the author has incorporated portions of his first and unpublished novel, Sky-Walk, or The Man Unknown to Himself. Clara Howard appeared in 1801, (repub. in London in 1806 under the title of Philip Stanley), and Jane Talbot in the same year. The last two are considered much inferior to his earlier productions. An unfinished novel—Memoir of Carwin, the Biloquist, (the germ of Wieland),—will be found in Dunlap's Life and Selections from the Works of Brown, 1815, vol. ii. 200-201. Mr. Brown pub. (1803-09) a number of political pamphlets, prepared with more care than is usually given to productions of an ephemeral character, and contributed many articles to The Columbus Magazine, The Weekly Magazine, &c. In 1799 he commenced the publication of The Monthly Magazine and American Review, which lived about a year only. In 1803 he made another attempt to establish a periodical, and The Literary Magazine and American Register—to which he was the principal contributor—was sustained for five years, (8 vols. 8vo.) The American Register—another project of his, commenced in 1807—was pub. in semi-annual volumes (7 in all) until his death in 1810. He made a translation of his friend Volney's Travels in the United States, 1804; wrote a Memoir of the Rev.

Dr. John Blair Linn, (whose sister he married in 1804,) prefixed to Valerian, 1805; pub. Memoirs of Stephen Calvert; and edited, with Life, C. H. Wilson's Beauties of Tom Brown, Lon., 1810, 12mo.

That Mr. Brown possessed a mind of remarkably inventive powers, and enjoyed an uncommon facility of graphic composition, no one perhaps will deny who has read the most indifferent of his novels. His faults are equally conspicuous, and among these has been reckoned an extravagant departure from the realities of every-day life; but from this charge Dr. Griswold relieves him:

"It has been said that he outraged the laws of art by gross improbabilities and inconsistencies, but the most incredible of his incidents had parallels in true history, and the metaphysical unity and consistency of his novels are apparent to all readers familiar with psychological phenomena. His works, generally written with great rapidity, are incomplete, and deficient in method. He disregarded rules and cared little for criticism. But his style was clear and nervous, with little ornament, free of affectations, and indicated a singular sincerity and depth of feeling."—Griswold's Prose Writers of America: q. v. for an interesting review of Brown's literary labours.

For some years after his death, his novels seem to have been almost forgotten. Mr. Verplanck complained in 1819, "He is very far from being a popular writer. There is no call, as far as we know, for a second edition of any of his works. He is rarely spoken of but by those who have an habitual curiosity about every thing literary, and a becoming pride in all good writing which appears amongst ourselves. They have not met with the usual success of leaders in matters of taste, since, with all their admiration, they have not been able to extend his celebrity much beyond themselves."—N. American Review, ix. 64.

Eight years after the above was written, an edition of the novels appeared in Boston, in 7 vols. It is well known that Godwin, the Sir Hildebrand Horrible of the English novelists, warmly admired Brown, and acknowledged his obligations to him. Brown in his turn admired, and appears to have imitated, portions of Caleb Williams.

"His talent for stirring the expectation of the reader, and keeping his anxiety alive from first to last, throughout some hazardous encounter, or mysterious event, can scarcely be paralleled in the history of fiction. . . . Upon the whole, this author may be considered as one of the best writers of romantic narrative (we give up character) that the present age has produced. There is scarcely any one, indeed, who is so eloquent as he oftentimes is; and not one who can excite such breathless apprehension, or so sublime a solitary fact. The only incidents that can be compared to Brown are,—the scene under the cliffs in the Antiquary, and that between the two ladies and the panthers in the Pioneers."—Vol. ix. 317, 1824.

Brown, John, D.D., a native of Rothbury, in Northumberland, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; obtained the living of Great Horkeley, Essex, 1754; Vicar of St. Nicholas, Newcastle, about 1758; committed suicide, when insane, 1766. Honour. a Poem. Essay on Satire. Two Sermons, 1746, 4to. A Sermon on Gaming, &c., preached at Bath, April 22, 1750. In consequence of this sermon, the public gambling tables at Bath were suppressed by the magistracy. Essays on Shaftesbury's Characteristics, Lon., 1751, 8vo; suggested to Brown by Warburton, and to Warburton by Pope, who told Warburton that to his knowledge the Characteristics had done more harm to revealed religion in England than all the other works of infidelity put together. The Essays were so popular that a 5th edit. was pub. in 1764. A Defence of Pitt. Letter to Dr. Lowth, 1766, 8vo. Diss. on Poetry and Musick, 1763, 4to. Brown pub. a number of other theological and literary works, 1754–66, but the only one which gave him great reputation was An Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times, Lon., 1757, 8vo. This proved to be one of the most popular treatises ever pub. in the language; no less than seven editions being called for in little more than a year from its appearance. A second vol. was pub. in 1758, and an edition in 3 parts, with an explanatory Defence of it, 1760–61.

"It was perhaps as extravagantly applauded, and as extravagantly censured, as any book that was ever written. The design of it was to show that 'a vain, luxurious, and selfish effeminacy, in the higher ranks of life,' marked the character of the age, and to point out the effects and sources of this effeminacy. And it must be owned, that, in the prosecution of it, the author has given abundant proofs of great discernment and solidity of judgment, a deep insight into human nature, and extensive knowledge of the world; and that he has marked the peculiar features of the time with great justice and accuracy."

He committed suicide, Sept. 23, 1766, in his 51st year.

Brown, John, 1722–1787, a native of Carpow, county of Perth, Scotland, a schoolmaster and divine at Haddington, attained great distinction by his knowledge of languages, acquired by his own industry, without the aid of teachers. He was acquainted with Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Persian, Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, French, Italian, and German. Two Short Catechisms, Edin., 1764; Glasg., 1777, 12mo. The Christian's Journal, Edin., 1766. Dictionary of the Holy Bible on the plan of Calmet, Lon., 1769, 2 vols. 8vo; often reprinted.

"A useful rather than a profound work; and has contributed very considerably to disseminate religious information in this country. As it was intended chiefly for common readers, the author, though a man of learning, and very general information, purposely avoided a display of learning."—ORNE.

"Allowances being made for some of his sentiments, his work may be advantageously substituted for Calmet's, the price of which necessarily places it above the reach of many persons."—HORNE.

"A very valuable body of information on divinity."—BROKEN-STERN.

Brown, John, D.D., b. 1785, Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, Senior Minister of the United Presby. Congr., Broughton Place, Edin., Prof. of Theology, &c., grandson of John Brown of Haddington, has pub. a number of theological works, 1821–62. We notice a few. Expository Discourses on the First Epistle to the Romans; 2d ed., Edin., 1849, 2 vols. 8vo. Discourses and Sayings of our Lord Jesus Christ; 2d ed., Edin., 1852, 3 vols. 8vo.

"These volumes add fresh lustre to Dr. Brown's well-deserved reputation as a Biblical scholar and practical theologian. They bear the impress of keen critical sagacity, of calm, comprehensive, and independent judgment, of extensive research, of sound exegetical principles, and of the most devout and loving reverence for Him whose 'Sayings' they illustrate. They are exquisite and exhaustive expositions of the words of our Lord."—Eclectic Rev.

"A noble work."—Free Church Magazine.
"One of the most valuable expository works in our language."—Baptist Magazine.

An Exposition of our Lord's Intercessory Prayer, Edin., 1850, 8vo. Discourses suited to the Administration of the Lord's Supper, Edin., 1823, 12mo. Highly commended. The Resurrection of Life, Edin., 1852, 8vo. Expository Lectures on the First Epistle of Peter, 2d ed., 1849, 8vo. Of this work, the North British Review says:

"It is neither Scottish nor German, but sprung from the high and rare union of the best qualities of both schools in a single mind. It has the Scottish clearness, precision, orthodoxy, practicality; the German learning, minuteness of investigation, and disregard of tradition; and for certain qualities too rare in both—resolute adherence to the very truth of the passage—unforced development of the connection, and basing of edification on the right meaning of the Scripture, we have not met with any thing in either country that surpasses it."

Brown, John, M.D., 1735–1788, the author of the Brunonian system in Medicine, was a native of Berwickshire. He was placed at school at Dunse, and soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in the Greek and Latin classics. He lectured on medicine at Edinburgh, and had his theory of medicine and practice of life been better, nothing could have prevented his attaining to great eminence. His new positions were embodied in Elementa Medicinæ, in Latin, 1780, 8vo. Editio alteram plurimum emendata et integrum demum opus exhibens, Edin., 1787, 2 vols. 8vo; 1794, 8vo. His work has been trans. into many languages. The author pub. an English version, Lon., 1788, 2 vols. 8vo; a new edit. by Dr. Beddoes, 1795, 2 vols. 8vo. Dr. Brown pub. Edin., 1787, 8vo. Observations on the Principles of the Old System of Physic, exhibiting a compound of the New Doctrine, &c. This work contains a violent attack upon Dr. Cullen's doctrine of Spasms. Dr. C. had been a warm friend of Dr. Brown's, and dissuaded him from seeking a professorship in one of the colleges of America, which was Brown's favourite scheme. Unfortunately, variance succeeded to friendship. A new edit. of Dr. Brown's works was pub. in 1804, Lon., 3 vols. 8vo, by Dr. William Cullen Brown. Mr. Pettigrew proves Brown to have been a better man than the popular estimate of his character would indicate. The Brunonian theory has been thus summed up,—imperfectly, no doubt:

"All general or universal diseases were reduced to two great families or classes,—the sthenic and the asthenic; the former depending upon excess, the latter upon deficiency, of exciting power. The former were to be removed by debilitating, the latter by stimulant, medicines, of which the most valuable and powerful are brandy and opium."

The controversy, pro and con., was carried on with great ardour. So keen became the wordy war at the Royal Medical Society that a number of duels were fought, and a law was passed that no future references should be had to the hostile field. Nor was the war confined to the place of its birth. France, Spain, Italy, Poland, and Russia took up the cudgels; and in Germany the combat waxed so fierce that the military were obliged to take possession of the University of Göttingen to quell the Brunonians and Anti-Brunonians. See Beddoes's edit. as above; Pettigrew; Rees's Encyc.; Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

"This book gives a complete history of that important affair known as The Marrow Controversy, which so agitated North Britain in the early part of the last century. It contains also lives of the principal Marrow Men, with notices of their works; it is very valuable on this account, as it contains more notices of the class of books to which it refers than any other book with which we are acquainted."

Brown, or Browne, Thomas, d. 1704, commonly called Tom Brown of Facetious Memory, as Addison styles him, was a native of Shropshire, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford. He seems to have had an equal taste for the acquisition of languages and the circulation of indecencies. Among his works are three pieces relative to Dryden, 1688, '89, '90. The Welch Levite tossed in a Blanket, Lon., 1691, fol. Trans. from the French, Lon., 1692, '93. The Salamanca Wedding, 1693. Short Epistles out of Roman, Greek, and French authors, 1682, 8vo. Whole Works, Lon., 1707, '08, 3 vols. 8vo. Like most scoffers, upon the approach of death he exhibited great remorse: but what an insecure hope to sinners is a so-called death-bed repentance!

"Brown was not a man deficient in literature, nor destitute of fancy; but he seems to have thought it the pinnacle of excellence to be a 'merry fellow;' and therefore laid out his powers upon small jests and gross buffoonery, so that his performances have little intrinsic value, and were read only while they were recommended by the novelty of the event that occasioned them. What sense or knowledge his works contain is disgraced by the garb in which it is exhibited."—Dr. Johnson: Life of Dryden.

Brown, Thomas, M.D., 1778–1820, one of the most eminent of modern metaphysicians, was the son of the Rev. Samuel Brown, Minister of Kirkmabreck, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, Scotland. He was sent to England to school at the age of seven, and returned to Scotland when fourteen. At Edinburgh he applied himself to his studies with great diligence and success. In 1796 he commenced the study of the law, but abandoned it for medicine, in which he took a doctor's diploma in 1803. In 1806 he entered into copartnership with the celebrated Dr. Gregory. Dugald Stewart, being indisposed in the winter of 1808–09, engaged Dr. Brown to read lectures for him in the Moral Philosophy Class. Brown's success was most decided. He satisfied both himself and his hearers that he had found his proper sphere, and, acting upon this persuasion, in 1810 he resigned his practice, and accepted the appointment of colleague to Dugald Stewart in the Chair of Moral Philosophy. His first appearance as an author was in 1798, when he pub. Observations on the Zoonomia of Erasmus Darwin, M.D., Edin., 1798, 8vo.

"The perhaps unmatched work of a boy in the eighteenth year of his age."—SIR JAS. MACKINTOSH.

"This was very favourably received by the public, and exhibited astonishing prematurity of talents and attainments."

Poems, Edin., 1804, 2 vols. 12mo.

"A collection which exhibits unquestionable marks of fertility of invention and refinement of taste."

A Criticism on Charges against Mr. Leslie, 1806, 8vo. In 1814 he completed a poem with which he had employed some intervals of leisure for several years. The Paradise of Coquette, (anon.) A reviewer of notes declared this to be "By far the best and most brilliant imitation of Pope that has appeared since the time of that great writer: with all his point, polish, and nicely-balanced versification, as well as his sarcasm and witty malice."

The War Fiend, 1816. The Wanderer in Norway; a Poem, 1816, 8vo. Agnes; a Poem, 1818, 8vo. Emily and other Poems, 2d edit., 1818, 8vo. But Dr. Brown's great work was Observations on the Nature and Tendency of Mr. Hume's Doctrine concerning the Relation of Cause and Effect, Edin., 1804, 8vo; 2d edit., 1806; 3d edit., greatly enlarged and improved, 1818. The merit of this work is too well known to render any detailed account of it necessary. See Welsh's life of Brown, Edin., 1825. 8vo.

"His first tract on Causation appeared to me the finest model of discussion in Mental Philosophy since Berkeley and Hume; with this superiority over the latter, that its aim is that of a philosopher who seeks to enlarge knowledge, not that of a skeptic, the most illustrious of whom have no better end than that of displaying their powers in confounding and darkening every truth; so that their very happiest efforts cannot be more leniently described than as brilliant fits of debauchery."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Fries. Diss. in Encycl. Brit.

"Neither Bacon, nor Hobbes, nor Berkeley, nor Locke, possessed powers of mind so splendid and so various. Brown is, beyond comparison, the most eloquent of philosophic writers. So much power and delicacy of intellect were never before united in an individual."—This's Magazine.

"This is a book of great power. Before Dr. Brown wrote, we were confoundedly all in the dark about causation. If ever there was a system which deserved the appellation of intelligible, compact, consistent, simple, this is the one."—N. American Review.

After Dr. Brown's decease appeared his Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, Edin., 1820, 4 vols. 8vo; reprinted by Welsh in 1828, 1 vol. 8vo, with an Index and Memoir. Of this excellent work many editions have been pub. in Great Britain and America.

"An inestimable book."—DR. PARK.

"It would be unjust to censure severely the declamatory parts of his Lectures; they are excusable in the first warmth of composition. They might even be justifiable allurements in attracting young hearers to abstruse speculations. . . . The prose of Dr. Brown is brilliant to excess. . . . It is darkened by excessive brightness; it loses ease and liveliness by over-dress; and, in the midst of its insidious sweetness, we wish for the striking and homely illustrations of Tucker, and for the pithy and sinewy sense of Paley."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

"The style is so captivating, the views so comprehensive, the arguments so acute, the whole thing so complete, that I was almost insensibly borne along upon the stream of his reasoning and his eloquence. In the power of analysis he greatly transcends all philosophers of the Scottish school who preceded him."—Morell's History of Modern Philosophy.

Brown, Thomas. Biblical Commentary on the Gospels and Acts, adapted especially for Preachers and Students, by Hermann Olshausen, D.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Erlangen. Trans. by the Rev. Thomas Brown, &c. In 4 vols. 8vo, forming vols. v., x., xvi. and xix. of Clark's Foreign Theological Library.

"Olshausen's Commentaries are perhaps the most valuable contribution to the interpretation of Scripture that have made their way to us from Germany. Minute and accurate, yet comprehensive and full, they are most helpful in guiding to the right understanding of Scripture. They are scholar-like in their execution, sounder in their doctrinal views than most German expositions, and elevated in their tone. There is often an air of poetic beauty thrown over passages which attracts and rivets."—Quarterly Journal of Prophecy.

Other works of this distinguished divine are pub. in the same series—T. & L. Clark's (Edinburgh) Foreign Theological Library.

"From the highly evangelical tone which in general pervades Olshausen's Commentaries, he may be regarded, in most cases, as a safe guide to the student who is just entering on the critical study of the New Testament."—Evangelical Mag.: notice of his Commentary on the Romans. Trans. by clergymen of the Church of England; vol. xiii. of Clark's For. Theol. Library.

His Commentary on the Epistles to the Galatians, Ephesians, Colossians, and Thessalonians, trans. by a clergyman of the Church of England, forms vol. xxi. in Clark's For. Theol. Library; and vol. xxiii. contains Commentary on the Epistles to the Philippians, to Titus, and the first to Timothy; in Continuation of the work of Olshausen. Lic. August Wiesinger. Trans. by Rev. John Fulton.

"Olshausen is a patient and learned writer, and evinces considerable moderation and reverence of tone."—English Review.

"Olshausen's mind is of the family of Augustine. His admirable Commentary on the New Testament is of inestimable benefit to the student, nay, to every thoughtful reader of the Bible."—ARCHDEACON HARE.

Arthur went to Ireland in 1771 or 1772, and during the remainder of his life was connected with Trinity College, Dublin, as Professor of Civil Law. "The author has followed Blackstone's Commentaries in the order of treating his subject. Browne, Edward. Legacies of Sir James Cambel, Lon., 1642, sm. 8vo.

Browne, Edward, M.D. 1644-1708, Physician to Charles II., and President of the London College of Physicians, the eldest son of the celebrated Sir Thomas Browne, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and Merton College, Oxford. Several of his papers will be found in Phil. Trans., 1670, '74, '81, &c. He is best known by A Brief Account of Travels in Hungary, Servia, &c., Lon., 1673, 4to; 2d edit. (with additions) entitled Account of Travels through a great part of Germany and the Low Countries, &c., 1677, 4to; 3d edit. (with further additions) entitled Travels in Hungary, Servia, &c., 1685, fol. Travels containing his Obs. on France and Italy, &c., 1763, 2 vols. 12mo. Trans. of a Discourse of the Original Country, &c. of the Cossacks, Lon., 1672, 12mo. His travels in Hungary, &c. have been highly commended by some authorities, and but little esteemed by others.

"The author has showed himself excellently qualified for a traveller by this ingenious piece, in which he has omitted nothing worthy the observation of so curious a person, having spent much of his time in the discovery of European rarities."—Introduc. to vol. 1st of Churchill's Voyages; "either written by, or at least under the direction of, the famous Mr. Locke."—Biog. Brit.

Dr. Johnson states that he had heard Browne's book highly commended by a learned traveller, who had visited many places after him; upon which the doctor remarks,

"But, whatever it may contribute to the instruction of a naturalist, I cannot recommend it as likely to give much pleasure to common readers."—Life of Sir Thomas Browne.

Dr. Johnson expresses a regret, in which we can all sympathize, that Sir Thomas Browne has left us no account of his travels.

"A book extravagantly and absurdly praised in the Biographia Britannica. His travels yield some information to naturalists, but little to the philosophical or common reader."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

"Natural history, the mines, mineral waters, as well as manners and customs, are described in this work, which bears a good character."—Stevenson: Voyages and Travels.

Dr. Browne, like his celebrated father, was distinguished for scholarship:

"He was acquainted with Hebrew, was a critic in Greek, and no man of his age wrote better Latin. German, Italian, French, &c., he spoke and wrote with as much ease as his mother tongue. Physic was his business, and to the promotion thereof all his other acquisitions were referred. King Charles said of him that 'he was as learned as any of the college, and as well-bred as any at court.'"

Browne, Isaac Hawkins, 1705-1760, a native of Burton-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He settled at Lincoln's Inn about 1727, and applied himself with great diligence to the study of the Law. Highmore, the painter, was his particular friend, and he addressed to him his poem on Design and Beauty.

"In this, one of the longest of his poems, he shows an extensive knowledge of the Platonic philosophy; and pursues, through the whole, the ideas of beauty advanced by that philosophy. By design is here meant, in a large and extensive sense, that power of genius which enables the real artist to collect together his scattered ideas, to range them in proper order, and to form a regular plan before he attempts to exhibit any work in architecture, painting, or poetry."—Preface to his Poems, pub. in 1768.

The Pipe of Tobacco, also written whilst at Lincoln's Inn, is an excellent imitation of Cibber, Ambrose Philips, Thomson, Young, Pope, and Swift, who were then all living.

"We need not say that the peculiar manner of these several writers is admirably hit off by our author, and that he hath shewn himself to have possessed an excellent imitative genius. Indeed, nothing but a wide spirit of discrimination, and a happy talent at various composition, could have enabled him to have succeeded so well as he hath done in The Pipe of Tobacco."—Ibid.

In 1754 he pub. his principal work, a Latin poem, entitled De Animi Immortalitate, in two books, 4to. This poem excited great admiration. In a few months translations into English were pub. by Dr. Richard Grey, Mr. Hay, John Lettice, and others. A trans. (the best made) by Soame Jenyns will be found in his Miscellanies, Lon., 1770, 8vo. Mr. Browne intended to have added a third book, but did not complete his design.

"In these three books he purposed to carry natural religion as far as it would go, and in so doing, to lay the true foundation of Christianity, of which he was a firm believer. But he went no farther than to leave a fragment of the third book, enough to make us lament that he did not complete the whole. . . . Not to mention the usefulness and importance of the subject, every man of taste must feel that the poem is admirable for its perspicuity, precision, and order; and that it unites the philosophical learning and eloquence of Cicero, with the numbers and much of the poetry of Lucretius and Virgil."—Biog. Brit.

"I am better pleased, when I consider the nature of the subject, with that neatness and purity of diction which is spread over the whole, than I should have been had more poetical ornaments been bestowed upon it."—Dr. GREEN, Bishop of Lincoln.

"I need not enter into a detail to show how well you have followed, not servilely imitated, Lucretius and Virgil; how perspicuously, as well as elegantly, you have handled some of the abstrusest arguments, &c."—Letter to Browne, from the celebrated James Harris.

Dr. Beattie, in his Essay on the Utility of Classical Learning, thus refers to our author:

"Isaac Hawkins Browne, Esq., author of several excellent Poems, particularly one in Latin on the immortality of the soul; of which Mrs. Carter justly says, that it does honour to our country."

Barnard, Cambridge, Upton, and Hoadly, all celebrated the praise of the successful poet. Browne's Latin and English poems were pub. Lon., 1768, 8vo; Essays on Metaphysics, Morals, and Religion, 1816, 8vo. Browne was elected to Parliament in 1744 and 1748. His success as an orator may be judged of from the following extract from Boswell's Johnson:

"We talked of public speaking. JOHNSON: 'We must not estimate a man's powers by his not being able to deliver his sentiments in public. Isaac Hawkins Browne, one of the first wits of this country, got into Parliament, and never opened his mouth.'"

Yet the difference between the famous Parliamentary orator, Gerard Hamilton, and the taciturn Isaac, was little more than one speech!

Wood refers to his erroneous opinions when a chaplain in the parliament army, and gives us to understand that, like most men unsettled in their views, he was in the habit of troubling others of more stability:

"Her style is modelled on the manner of the old bards; and though her poetry never reaches the height she evidently sought to attain, it is excellent for its pure taste and just sentiment; while a few instances of bold imagination show vividly the ardour of a fancy which prudence and delicacy always controlled."—Mrs. Hall's Records of Women.

Browne, Simon, 1680–1732, a Dissenting minister of great learning, was a native of Shepton Mallet, Somersetshire. In 1716 he accepted a call to the pastoral charge of the congregation of Dissenters in Old Jewry, London. Here he was eagerly listened to by crowded congregations until 1723, when, from grief at the loss of his wife and only son, he became deranged on a particular subject, though mentally undisturbed on other matters. He was firmly persuaded that the Supreme Being had

"Annihilated in him the thinking substance, and utterly divested him of consciousness: that though he retained the human shape, and the faculty of speaking, in a manner that appeared to others rational, he had all the while no more notion of what he said than a parrot."

He continued under this delusion for the rest of his life. He gave up his clerical charge, and refused to join in any act of worship, either public or private. Yet while in this sad condition, he wrote his celebrated answer to Woolston's Discourse on the Miracles of our Saviour, and his strictures upon Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation. If he was crazy, he was at least more than equal to two infidels; and so Woolston and Tindal found to their cost. He also evinced his mental vigour by the compilation of Greek and Latin Dictionaries; though, indeed, he does not seem to have considered this any evidence of intellectual ability: he replied to a friend who called in, and asked him what he was doing,—

"I am doing nothing that requires a reasonable soul; I am making a Dictionary; but you know thanks should be returned to God for every thing, and therefore for DICTIONARY-MAKERS."

We hope that our rather impolitic disinterestedness in introducing this anecdote into our Lexicon will be duly appreciated.

Browne, Sir Thomas, M.D., 1605–1682, one of the most distinguished of English writers, was a native of London. His father, a highly respectable merchant, died during his nonage, and his mother was married again to Sir Thomas Dutton. His education was commenced at Winchester, from whence, in 1623, he was sent to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he was entered a gentleman commoner. He took the degree of M.A., studied medicine, and commenced practice in Oxfordshire. Shortly afterwards he visited the Continent, studied at Padua, and was created Doctor of Physic in the University of Leyden. He returned to England about 1633, and between this and 1635 is supposed to have written his Religio Medici. In 1636 he settled at Norwich, and in 1637 he was created Doctor of Physic in the University of Oxford. Four years later he was united in marriage to a lady of the name of Mileham, of a Norfolk family. The wife considered his desertion of a bachelor life, after his curious proposition in the Religio Medici, to afford a fair handle against him. But Browne let them laugh to their content, satisfied with his domestic happiness. The amiable pair were united for the long term of one-and-forty years, and saw ten children growing up around them. He was chosen an Honorary Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians in 1664, and in 1671 received the honour of knighthood from Charles II. Before his death he made donations for the benefit of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Christ Church, Oxford. We now come to speak of those works which have placed him in the first rank of English authors. The Religio Medici.—The Religion of a Physician,—his first work, was not designed, the author states, for publication. A MS. copy floated about for some time from hand to hand, until it found its way to the press, without the author's knowledge, in 1642, in which year two editions were pub. (Lon., 8vo.) An edition was put forth by the author in 1643, and by 1685 it had passed through no less than eight editions. The correspondence between Sir Kenelm Digby and the author, relative to the annotations of the former, need only be alluded to here. A detailed account will be found in the Biog. Brit., and some sensible observations on the subject in Johnson's Life of Sir Thomas Browne, and in Mr. Simon Wilkins's Preface in H. G. Bohn's excellent edition, 1852, 3 vols. Mr. Merryweather of Cambridge introduced Religio Medici to the learned of other lands, by a Latin version, which was pub. in Holland in 1644, and the same year in Paris, and in Strasburg in 1652, with copious notes by Moltkenius. The notes of Sir Kenelm Digby will be found in the English edition of 1643, and those in the editions from 1644 are by Thomas Keck of the Temple. From Merryweather's version it was trans. into Italian, German, Dutch, and French,

"The Religio Medici was no sooner published, than it excited the attention of the public by the novelty of paradoxes, the dignity of sentiment, the quick succession of images, the multitude of abstruse allusions, the subtlety of disquisition, and the strength of language."—DR. SAM'L JOHNSON.

The famous Guy Patin, in a letter from Paris, April 7, 1645, alludes to the sensation which its publication excited in that polished capital:

"The book entitled Religio Medici is in high credit here. The author has wit; there are abundance of fine things in that book; he is a humorist, whose thoughts are very agreeable, but who, in my opinion, is to seek for a master in religion—as many others are—and in the end, perhaps, may find none. One may say of him, as Philip de Comines did of the founder of the Minimes, a hermit of Calabria, Francis de Paula, 'he is still alive, and may grow worse as well as better:'"

It is certainly calculated to induce caution in an author when he remembers that, for a few careless remarks, a sincere Christian, like Browne, has had attributed to him a character which he would have considered a lasting disgrace—that of an unbeliever in Christianity. Salmasius, Buddaeus, Tobias Wagner, Müller, and Reiser, consider him as doubtful, an infidel, or even atheistic, as their views vary, whilst Reimannus and Heister warmly vindicate his orthodoxy. This grave charge of unbelief, or even of skepticism, is altogether unjustifiable. The disreputable ranks of the enemies of truth are ever on the watch to stamp their brand of infamy on the brow of those whose reputation they hope will strengthen their wretched cause. As Johnson well remarks,

"In proportion as they doubt the truth of their own doctrines, they are desirous to gain the attestation of another understanding; and industriously labour to win a proselyte, and eagerly catch at the slightest pretence to dignify their sect with a celebrated name."

Johnson sums up the case as respects Sir Thomas in his own masterly style:

"The opinions of every man must be learned from himself: concerning his practice, it is safest to trust the evidence of others. When these testimonies concur, no higher degree of historical certainty can be obtained; and they apparently concur to prove, that Browne was a zealous adherent to the faith of Christ, that he lived in obedience to his laws, and died in confidence of his mercy."

In 1646 Browne pub. his Pseudodoxia Epidemica, or Enquiries into very many received Tenets, and commonly presumed Truths, (sm. folio;) 2d edit., enlarged and corrected, 1650, fol.; again in 1659, fol.; and in 1669, '72, 4to; 6th edit., with improvements, 1673; in French, Paris, 1733, 2 vols. 12mo. This was received with great favour, although it was criticized by Alexander Ross, (who as Medicus Medicatus had attacked Religio Medici), as Arcana Microcosmi, and by Robinson in his Eudoxa, or a Calm Ventilation, &c.

"It is indeed to be wished, that he had longer delayed the publication, and added what the remaining part of his life might have furnished: the thirty-six years which he spent afterwards in study and experience, would doubtless have made large additions to an Inquiry into Vulgar Errors."—Johnson's Life of Sir T. B.

"Browne's Inquiry into Vulgar Errors displays a great deal of erudition, but scarcely raises a high notion of Browne himself as a philosopher, or of the state of physical knowledge in England. The errors he indicates are such as none but illiterate persons, we should think, were likely to hold, and I believe that few on the continent so late as 1646, would have required to have them exploded with such an ostentation of proof. Who did not know that the phoenix is a fable?"—Hallam's Introduc. to Lit. Hist.

But some other learned authorities estimate this work very differently:

"No modern author has treated this subject more accurately or copiously. In his first book he learnedly inquires into the general causes of error; and in his succeeding books he not only discourses of the mistakes which are crept into natural philosophy, but such also as have corrupted history, theology, mechanic arts, and physics."—MORRIS.

"As he excelled in theoretical and practical divinity, so he shone no less in philosophy, wherein he emulated Hercules; and undertaking by his Pseud. Ep. to clear the sciences from error, he fell nothing short of the other's labour in cleansing the Augean stable."—REIMMAN.

"It is an excellent work, and contains abundance of curious things."—NICHOLSON.

See Supplet. Memoir by Simon Wilkins, prefixed to H. G. Bohn's edit., 1852, 3 vols.

In 1658 appeared his Hydriotaphia, Urne-Burial, or a Discourse of the Sepulchral Urnes lately found in Norfolk.

"From the trivial incident of the discovery of a few urns at Walsingham, he undertakes to treat of the funeral rites of all nations, and has endeavoured to trace these rites to the principles and feelings which gave rise to them. The extent of reading displayed in this single treatise is most astonishing, and the whole is irradiated with the flashes of a bright and highly poetical genius, though we are not sure that any regular plan can be discovered in the work."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist., q. v.

"There is perhaps none of his works which better exemplify his reading or memory. It is scarcely to be imagined how many particulars he has amassed together in a treatise which seems to have been occasionally written; and for which, therefore, no materials could have been previously collected."—Johnson's Life of T. B.

To this work was added the Garden of Cyrus, or the Quincunxial Lousenge, or Net Work Plantation of the Ancients, artificially, naturally, mystically, considered. In this work the author searches diligently for any thing approaching to the form of a quincunx, and his ingenuity discovers, Coleridge says,

"Quincunxes in heaven above, quincunxes in earth below, quincunxes in the mind of man, quincunxes in tones, in optic nerves, in roots of trees, in leaves, in every thing."

In lieu of a very learned definition of a quincunx, let the reader accept the following as a pictorial representation thereof:

Johnson wittily remarks upon Browne's ingenuity in discovering Quincunxes, that

"A reader, not watchful against the power of his infusions, would imagine that decussation was the great business of the world, and that nature and art had no other purpose than to exemplify and imitate a quincunx."

Sir Thomas left a number of treatises, a collection of which was published after his death, by Doctor, afterwards Archbishop, Tenison, (Lon., 1684, 8vo.), and another by John Hase. Christian Morals was pub. by Dr. Jeffrey in 1716. A notice of these learned pieces will be found in Johnson's Life of Browne. It has been remarked that

"Certainly never any thing fell from his pen which did not deserve to see the light. His very letters were dissertations, and full of singular learning, though written upon the most common subjects."

His collected works were pub. in 1686, fol. In 1836 Simon Wilkin, F.L.S., Esq., favoured the world with an edition in 4 vols. 8vo, which has been recently (in 1852) pub. in 3 vols. 8vo, in Henry G. Bohn's excellent Antiquarian Library, which, with his other valuable libraries of standard works, we commend to the reader's attention. In Mr. Wilkin's edition of Browne's works will be found, besides other important matter, much bibliographical information respecting the early impressions of Browne's different treatises. Every one who desires to enjoy the evidences of a massive grandeur which he little expected to find in an English author, should hasten to the perusal of the verba ardentia—the pondera verborum—of Browne, as to a noble intellectual repast. We think that too much stress has been laid upon Johnson's alleged imitations of the style of the learned physician. The lexicographer was more indebted to Browne than was the essayist. Johnson certainly learned something from Browne, but perhaps he profited as much by Chambers, and more by Sir William Temple. In depth and suggestiveness Browne as much excels Johnson, as the latter excels the former in fluency and grace of modulation. Who ever had to read a sentence of Johnson's twice before he could comprehend it? Who ever read a page of Browne's without a reinspection of several passages, which had perplexed more than they had gratified? Yet such intellectual exercise is most healthful, and promotes a mental robustness and vigour which amply repay the cost at which they are acquired. We commend to the attention of our readers the following volume:—Religio Medici: Its Sequel, Christian Morals. By Sir Thomas Browne, Kt., M.D. With resemblant Passages from Cowper's Task; and a Verbal Index, post 8vo.

"The public in general, and all readers of pure taste and virtuous feelings in particular, are deeply indebted to the editor for publishing, for the first time, Sir T. Browne's admirable Religio Medici and its sequel, Christian Morals, together in one volume; and also for his careful correction of the text in both. The index is rich in good old English words; but the great attraction is the quotation of corresponding passages from Cowper's Task, which shew how fully imbued the poet was with the elder author."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

We conclude with some opinions upon the works of this ornament of knighthood and medicine,—than whom a greater has not adorned the learning of the one, nor dignified the chivalry of the other.

"Sir Thomas Browne, by his intense earnestness and vivid solemnity, seems ready to endow the grave itself with life. He does not linger in the valley of the shadow of death, but enters within the portals where the regal destroyer keeps his awful state; and yet there is nothing thin, airy, or unsubstantial—nothing ghostly or shocking in his works. He unweave, with a reverent touch, the material treasures of the sepulchre: he describes these with the learning of an antiquary; moralises on them with the wisdom of a philosopher; broods over them with the tenderness of an enthusiast; and associates with them sweet congenial images, with the fancy of a poet. He is the laureat of the king of terrors; and most nobly does he celebrate the earthly magnificence of his kingdom. He discovers consolations not only in the hopes of immortality, but in the dusty and sad ornaments of the tomb. Never surely by any other writer was sentiment thus put into dry bones."—Lon. Retrospective Review, 1820, vol. i. 59.

"I wonder and admire his entireness in every subject that is before him. He follows it, he never wanders from it, and he has no occasion to wander; for whatever happens to be the subject, he metamorphoses all nature into it. In the treatise on some urns dug up in Norfolk, how earthy, how redolent of graves and sepulchres is every line! You have now dark mould, now a thigh-bone, now a skull, then a bit of mouldered coffin, a fragment of an old tombstone with moss in its 'Hic Jacet'; a ghost, or a winding-sheet, or the echo of a funeral psalm wafted on a November wind; and the gayest thing you shall meet with shall be a silver nail or a gilt 'Anno Domini' from a perished coffin-top."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist.

"It is not on the praises of others, but on his own writings, that he is to depend for the esteem of posterity; of which he will not easily be deprived while learning shall have any reverence among men; for there is no science in which he does not discover some skill; and scarce any kind of knowledge, profane or sacred, abstruse or elegant, which he does not appear to have cultivated with success."—DR. SAM'L JOHNSON.

"A superior genius was exhibited in Sir Thomas Browne. His mind was fertile and ingenious; his analogies original and brilliant; and his learning so much out of the beaten path, that it gives a peculiar and uncommon air to all his writings."—HALLAM.

"Such was his sagacity and knowledge of all history, ancient and modern, and his observations thereupon so singular, that if hath been said by them that knew him best, that if his profession, and place of abode, would have suited his ability, he would have made an extraordinary man for the privy council, not much inferior to the famous Padre Paulo, the late oracle of the Venetian state."—WHITTAKER.

With regard to the question, before referred to, as to the religious opinions of Sir Thomas, it is to be observed that all doubt upon that point should be settled by the testimony of Whitefoot, his intimate friend for forty-one years:

"He fully assented to the Church of England, preferring it before any in the world, as did the learned Grotius. He attended the public service very constantly, when he was not withheld by his practice. Never missed the sacrament in his parish, if he were in town. . . . I visited him near his end, when he had not strength to hear or speak much; the last words which I heard from him were, besides some expressions of fear, that he did freely submit to the will of God, being without fear."

We doubt not that, in that solemn hour which converts even thoughtlessness into solemnity, this wise and learned physician, who had been all his lifetime subject to the fear, guided by the counsel, and animated by the love, of that great Being who trieth the heart of the children of men, and understandeth all their ways,—we doubt not, in that solemn hour, he could look beyond the "narrow house appointed for all living"—the furniture of which no other pencil hath so magnificently described—to the "sufficiency of Christian immortality,"—to the resurrection of the just. Was the English tongue ever put to a grander use than in that noble "conclusion of the whole matter," with which he sums up what we may call the requiem of the King of Terrors himself?

"But the sufficiency of Christian immortality frustrates all earthly glory, and the quality of either state after death makes a folly of posthumous memory. God, who can only destroy our souls, and hath assured our resurrection, either of our bodies or names hath directly promised no duration. Wherein there is so much of chance, that the boldest expectants have found an unhappy frustration; and to hold long subsistence seems but a scape in oblivion. But man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave, solemnizing natiivities and death with equal lustre, nor omitting ceremonies of bravery in the infancy of his nature."—Hydrotopia, Book v.

It had been melancholy indeed, if that far-reaching and comprehensive mind, which knew so much of the works of God, had never attained to the knowledge of their Creator: if that brilliant intellect, which had shed so bright a light for the instruction and edification of others, had itself, at last, gone "out in obscure darkness!"

Browne, William. His Five Years' Practice: or an Exact Discourse concerning Snafe Riding, for Trotting and Ambling, Lon., 1624, 4to.

Browne, William, b. 1590, at Tavistock, in Devonshire, became a student of Exeter College, Oxford, about the beginning of the reign of James I. Britannia's Pastorals, two books, part 1, 1613; part 2, 1616; Lon. fol.: both parts, 1625, 8vo. The Shepherd's Pipe, Lon., 1614, 1620, 8vo. His Works, containing the above two, the Inner Temple Masque, and other Poems, edited by the Rev. W. Thompson, Lon., 1772, 3 vols. sm. 8vo.

Browne's poetry was greatly admired in its day, but soon fell into neglect. The author of the advertisement prefixed to his works laments that "He who was admired and beloved by all the best writers of his time; who was esteemed and recommended highly by the critical Johnson and the learned Selden, was, in a few years after his death, almost forgotten."

The fourth Eclogue of The Shepherd's Pipe, in which he laments the death of his friend Thomas Manwood, has been greatly commended. The writer just quoted remarks, "I dare not say, that it is equal to the celebrated Lycidas of Milton, but surely it is not much inferior. That genius has not declined to imitate William Browne; and Lycidas owes its origin to Philarete."

"It will appear even to our most infallible critics, that though Mr. Browne wrote an hundred and eleven years ago, his language is as nervous, his numbers as harmonious, his descriptions as natural, his panegyrics as soft, and his satire as pointed, as any that are to be found in the whiff-syllabub poetasters of the present century."—Memoirs of the Life of William Puttenham, pub. in 1728, 8vo.

"His imagination was fertile, and his mind vigorous; but his judgment was corrupted by those Italian models which the fashion of his day taught him to imitate. His descriptions, though picturesque, have an air of extravagance; his conceptions, though strong, have marks of deformity; and his language never flows in a strain of continued purity. He could not plan with precision and delicacy, and was unable to join correctness with spirit."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1772.

Anthony Wood remarks that

"As he had honoured his country with his elegant and sweet pastorals, so was he expected, and also entreated, a little farther to grace it, by drawing out the line of his poetic ancestors, beginning in Joseph Iacanius, [Joseph of Exeter, 13th century,] and ending in himself."—Athen. Oxon.

Wood says that much of a work of this kind had been prepared by Browne, and Oldys intimates the same thing, and pronounces him to have been most capable of so important an undertaking:

"He was reported a man not only the best versed in the works and beauties of the English poets, but also in the history of their lives and characters."—Oldys's MSS.

We take the above notices from the Biog. Brit., to which the reader is referred for further particulars.

"It appears to us, that sufficient justice has not, since the era of Milton, been paid to his talents; for, though it be true, as Mr. Headley has observed, that perillities, forced allusions, and conceits, have frequently debased his materials, yet are these amply atoned for by some of the highest excellencies of his art; by an imagination ardent and fertile, and sometimes sublime; by a vivid personification of passion; by a minute and truly faithful delineation of rural scenery; by a peculiar vein of tenderness which runs through the whole of his pastorals; and by a versification uncommonly varied and melodious. With these are combined a species of romantic extravagance which sometimes heightens, but more frequently degrades the effect of his pictures. Had he exhibited greater judgment in the selection of his imagery, and greater simplicity in his style, his claim on posterity had been valid, had been general and undisputed."—Drake's Shakespeare and his Times.

Sir Egerton Brydges pub. some poems of Browne, not before printed. We regret that we have not space for the eloquent eulogy of Browne by Thomas Miller, a delightful writer of our own day, still living. We must extract a line or two:

"He carries with him the true aroma of old forests: his lines are mottled with mosses, and there is a gnarled ruggedness upon the stems of his trees. His waters have a wet look and splashing sound about them, and you feel the fresh air play around you while you read. His birds are the free denizens of the fields, and they send their songs so life-like through the covert, that their music rings upon the ear, and you are carried away with his 'sweet pippings.'"

Browne commemorates in ardent strains the poetical powers of his friend George Wither:

"DAVIS and WITHER, by whose Muse's power,
A natural day to me seems but an hour;
And could I ever bear their learned lays,
Ages would turn to artificial days."

From Britannia's Pastorals.

Wither returns the compliment in as complimentary a style:

"Roget here on Willy calls
To sing out his Pastoralls:
Warrants Fame shall grace his rhymes,
Spits of Envy and the Times."

From Abuse Strip and Whipt: or, Satyrical Essays, Lon., 1613, 8vo.

Again,

"I feel an envious touch,
And tell thee, swain, that at thy time I grutch;
Wishing the art that makes this poem shine,
And this thy work (wert thou not wronged) mine."

Rare Ben Jonson admired Browne greatly:

"I would
More of our writers would, like thee, not swell
With the how much they set forth, but the how well."

A poet who can elicit the warm encomiums of such men as Selden, Jonson, Drayton, Wither, Davies, and many others, distinguished for learning or knowledge of the poet's art—and those men his contemporaries—must needs have rare merit. To few authors has it chanced to be so enthusiastically lauded by one age and so thoroughly neglected by the next. Of poems which were devoured with rapture, and praised with warmth, a third edition was not demanded for a century and a half.

Browne, Sir William, M.D., 1692–1774, a native of Norfolk, was entered of Peter-house, Cambridge, in 1707, where he took the degrees, B.A., 1710; M.A., 1714; M.D., 1721. He was a frequent publisher of small pieces, principally classical, and always with as thorough an infusion of Latin and Greek as they would possibly bear, for Sir William was as fond of the "manner of the ancients" as was his professional brother in Peregrine Pickle. We notice a few of his publications: Dr. Gregory's Elements of Catoptrics and Dioptrics, translated from the Latin Original, &c., Lon., 1715, 8vo. The Pill Plot, 1734, 4to. Opuscula Varia, 1765, 4to. A Vindicta of the College of Physicians, 1753. Odes in imitation of Horace, addressed to Sir Robert Walpole and the Duke of Montagu, 1765. A Farewell Oration at the College of Physicians, 1768, 4to: this contains many curious particulars of Sir William's life: Fragmenta Isaaci Hawkins Browne, &c., 1768, 4to. Three Odes, 1771, 4to. A Proposal on our Coin, 1774, 4to. A New Year's Gift, 1772, 4to. Speech to the Royal Society, 1772, 4to. Elegy and Address, 1773, 4to. A Latin Version of Job, unfinished, 4to.

Sir William was a most curious character, and the reader will find an interesting account of him in Nichol's Literary Anecdotes, and Chalmers's Biog. Dict. Bishop Warburton gives an amusing account (in a letter to Bishop Hurd) of a visit with which he was honoured by Sir William:

"When I came down into the drawing-room, I was accosted by a little, round, well-fed gentleman, with a large muff in one hand, a small Horace, open, in the other, and a spying-glass dangling in a black ribbon at his button. . . . We then took our chairs; and the first thing he did or said, was to propose a doubt to me concerning a passage in Horace, which all this time he had still open in his hand. Before I could answer, he gave me the solution of this long-misunderstood passage; and, in support of his explanation, had the charity to repeat his own paraphrase of it in English verse, just come hot, as he said, from the brain."

Foote, in his Devil upon Two Sticks, gave an exact representation of him, as sketched above, upon the stage. Sir William sent him his card, thanking him for so happy a likeness, but remarked that as Foote had forgotten the muff, he sent him his own!

At the age of eighty, he came to Batson's coffee-house in his laced coat and band, and fringed white gloves, to show himself to Mr. Crosby, then Lord Mayor. A gentleman present observing that he looked very well, he replied he had "neither wife nor debts."

Browne, William George, 1768-1813, an eminent traveller, a native of London, educated at Oriel College, Oxford, was murdered by banditti when on his way from Tabriz to Teheran. Mr. Brown was stimulated to the love of adventure by the perusal of Bruce's Travels. He passed many years in investigations in Africa, Egypt, Syria, Greece, &c. Travels in Africa, Egypt, and Syria, in the years 1792-98, Lon., 1799, 4to; 2d and best edit., enlarged, 1806, 4to.

"This work was highly esteemed, and is classed by Major Renel among the best performances of the kind: but from the abruptness and dryness of the style, it never became very popular."—Encyc. Brit.

"From Kahira Mr. Brown penetrated into Upper Egypt. In accompanying this traveller through that country, the reader will find much more of ancient curiosities on the one hand, and a much abler description of the people on the other, than in Sonnini."—Anti-Jacobin Review.

"A most valuable work, and except in some few peculiarities of the author, a model for travellers; it is particularly instructive in what relates to Darfour."—Steyenson.

"In courage, prudence, love of science, and intimate acquaintance with the Eastern languages and manners, he has never been exceeded."—Pinkerton.

Brownell, Henry Howard. Poems, N. Y., 16mo. "There is much genuine poetry in this volume. The sentiment is elevated, the imagery at times highly impressive, and some of the poems are calculated deeply to affect our finer sensibilities."

Brownell, Thomas Church, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Connecticut, b. 1779, at Westfield, Massachusetts, has pub. a number of valuable theological works. Commentary on the Book of Common Prayer, r. 8vo. Consolation for the Afflicted, 18mo. Christian's Walk and Consolation, 18mo. Exhortation to Repentance, 18mo. Family Prayer Book. Religion of the Heart and Life, 5 vols. Religious Inquirer Answered, 18mo. Youthful Christian's Guide, 18mo.

Browning, Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett, b. in London of a family in affluent circumstances, and educated with great care. She gave very early proofs of genius. At the age of ten she attempted writing both in prose and verse, and at fifteen her powers as a writer were known to her friends. Her "Essay on Mind, with other Poems," was published by her at the age of seventeen. The Seraphim, and other Poems, Lon., 1838, The Romaunt of the Page, 1839, The Drama of Exile, Isobel's Child, Casa Guidi Windows, 1851, Miscellaneous Poems, &c. deservedly occupy a high place in English poetical literature. In addition to her original works, she has distinguished herself by a translation into English of the Prometheus Bound of Æschylus, which has been styled

"A remarkable performance for a young lady, but not a good translation in and by itself. It is too frequently uncouth, without being faithful, and, under a pile of sounding words, lets the fire go out. . . . Miss Barrett has not attempted to reproduce the grand effect of anæpæstic systems of the Greek, for which, nevertheless, there are great facilities in English, and, instead of the fullest and completest close in the whole range of the Greek drama, the English Prometheus comes to an end before you expect it."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

This version of the Prometheus Bound was pronounced "an early failure" by the mature judgment of the writer, who made a new translation, which now appears in the collected edition of her works. Mrs. Browning, who is as distinguished for learning as for genius, contributed a series of critical papers on the Greek Christian Poets to the London Athenæum.

Miss Barrett was married in 1846 to Mr. Robert Browning, the author of Paracelsus, &c. The reviewer whom we have just quoted gives our authoress credit for "extraordinary acquaintance with ancient classical literature," and few writers of the day have more enthusiastic admirers, whilst certain grave faults are fully acknowledged:

"It is with real pain that we say, surely never was gold so disguised and overlaid with tinseal as hers,—never was real merit made to look so like what Carlyle would call a 'sham.' She possesses genius, a cultivated mind, a truth-loving heart, quick powers of observation, and luxuriance of fancy and expression; but that luxuriance too often verges—to say the least—on extravagance. Her thoughts, fine in themselves, are not clearly conceived, and are expressed in a wilderness of words in which it is sometimes difficult to pick up one distinct, intelligible idea. Her genius is erratic, and runs away with her; in short, what avails truth to nature, and poetic power, when the writer thinks proper to be unintelligible? . . . There is little in the praise which has been bestowed on Miss Barrett's poems in which we cannot heartily join, and we might have contented ourselves with citing agreeable passages and iterating that praise; but we have pursued a course more likely, we hope, to be profitable to this highly-gifted lady, and to the minds of the living and unborn on whom she has the power to confer benefit—and benefit of the highest order."—British Quarterly Review, vol. li. p. 357.

We refer the reader to a review of the poems of our authoress in Blackwood's Magazine, vol. lvi. p. 621.

"It is plain that Miss Barrett would always write well if she wrote simply from her own heart, and without thinking of the composition of any other author—at least let her think of them only in so far as she is sure that they embody great thoughts in pure and appropriate language, and in forms of construction which will endure the most rigid scrutiny of common sense and unperverted taste."

The faults with which this gifted author is justly chargeable—obscurity, strained and affected construction, and incongruous admixtures of the language of Æschylus with the language of Shakespeare—we hope to see reformed altogether in her future labours. One of her reviewers remarks,

"Mr. Leigh Hunt, in one of his clever poems, calls her 'the sister of Tennyson.' We object to this, and claim her as Shakespeare's daughter! Great as Robert Browning is in the world of poetry, his wife is literally 'the better half.'"

Mr. Moir, one of the fairest of contemporary critics, remarks,

"Gifted with a fine and peculiar genius, what Mrs. Browning might have achieved, or may yet achieve, by concentration of thought and rejection of unworthy materials, it is impossible to say; but most assuredly she has hitherto marred the effect of much she has written by a careless self-satisfaction. Instead of being a comet that 'from its horrid half shakes pestilence and war,' she might have been, and I trust is destined yet to be, a constellation to twinkle for ever in silver beauty amid the blue serena."—Sketches of the Port. Lit. of the Past Half-Century.

"Mrs. Browning's Poems are of the class the full beauty and value of which can but scantily be indicated by extracts. Yet it would not be difficult to select passages instinct with a life and beauty of their own."—London Examiner.

Our learned friend, Rev. Dr. Geo. W. Bethune, a critic of exquisite taste, remarks that "Mrs. Browning is singularly bold and adventurous. Her wing carries her, without faltering at their obscurity, into the cloud and the mist, where not seldom we fail to follow her, but are tempted, while we admire the honesty of her enthusiasm, to believe that she utters what she herself has but dimly perceived. Much of this, however, arises from her disdain of carefulness."

We shall conclude our sketch with a few lines from two of our writer's own sex:

"Such is the influence of her manners, her conversation, her temper, her thousand sweet and attaching qualities, that they who know her best are apt to lose sight altogether of her learning and of her genius, and to think of her only as the most charming person that they have ever met."—Mary Russell Mitford's Recollections of a Literary Life.

"In delicacy of perception Miss Barrett may vie with any of her sex. She has what is called a true woman's heart, although we must believe that men of a fine conscience and good organization will have such a heart no less. Signal instances occur to us in the cases of Spenser, Wordsworth, and Tennyson. The woman who reads them will not find hardness or blindness as to the subtler workings of thoughts and affections."

"If men are often deficient on this score, women on the other hand are apt to pay excessive attention to the slight tokens, the little things of life. Thus, in conduct or writing, they tend to weary us with a morbid sentimentalism. From this fault Miss Barrett is wholly free."—Margaret Fuller.

The 4th Eng. ed. of Mrs. Browning's Poems was pub. Lon., 1856, 3 vols. 12mo; and in the same year she gave to the world Aurora Leigh. Reviews of this poem will be found in the North British Review, February, 1857, (being a general notice of Mrs. Browning's literary characteristics,) and in the London Athenæum, Nov. 22, 1856, No. 1425; N. Amer. Rev., &c. Amer. ed. of her poems, N.Y., 3 vols. 12mo. Aurora Leigh, 12mo.

Browning, Robert. b. 1812, at Camberwell, England, and educated at the London University, is one of the most eminent poets of the day. In 1836 he pub. Paracelsus, which was highly commended by a number of critics, but not extensively read. In 1837 his Tragedy of Stratford was produced, Mr. Macready personating the hero.

"It is the work of a young poet," remarks a critic, "but is well conceived and arranged for effect, while its relation to a deeply interesting and stirring period of British history gives it a peculiar attraction to an English audience."

Mr. Browning's other works are Sordella; Pippa Passes; The Blot in the Scutcheon, (played at Drury Lane in 1843); King Victor and King Charles; Dramatic Lyrics; Return of the Druses; Columbe's Birthday; Dramatic Romances; Luria; Bells and Pomegranates, (of which Pippa Passes is the first); Christmas Eve; Easter-Day; Men and Women, 1855. His collected works have been pub. in 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., (last ed., 1849,) and also by Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, 2 vols. 18mo, (last ed., 1856.) Mr. Browning was married in November, 1846, to Elizabeth Barrett, one of the most learned poetesses of the age. Since their marriage they have resided in Florence.

"Next to Tennyson, we hardly know of another English poet who can be compared with Browning. The grandest pieces in the volumes [of his Collected Works] are Pippa Passes, and A Blot in the Scutcheon. The latter, in the opinion of Charles Dickens, is the finest Poem of the century. Once read, it must haunt the imagination forever: for its power strikes deep into the very substance and core of the soul."—E. P. WHIPPLE.

"Many English dramas have been written within a few years, the authors of which have established their claim to the title of poet. We cannot but allow that we find in them fine thoughts finely expressed, passages of dignified and sustained eloquence, and as adequate a conception of character as the reading of history and the study of models will furnish. But it is only in Mr. Browning that we find enough of freshness, vigour, grasp, and of that clear insight and conception which enable the artist to construct characters from within, and so to make them real things, and not images, as to warrant our granting the honour due to the dramatist."—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL: N. Amer. Review, lvi. 357: read the whole of this well-written article.

"He is equally a master of thought and emotion, and joins to a rare power of imaginative creation that which is still more rarely found in union with it—the subtlest power of mental reasoning and analysis. Over the instrument of language he exerts the most delicate mastery, and few poets have moved with such free and flowing step through the most complicated word mazes of music and measure."—London Examiner.

"We should say that Robert Browning deserves his position from his originality; but although his name has a certain celebrity, he has not yet won for himself a niche in the temple of his nation's literature. He is rather a thinker than a singer; and yet cannot be accepted as a remarkable thinker. The grand conception of his larger works is weak and wavering, but the details exhibit no common powers. Whatever merits he may possess, are, however, damaged by the eccentricity and want of beauty of his style. It is abrupt, harsh, full of familiar turns and yet not familiar in its general structure; spasmodic in its vehemence, and obscure from mere negligence."—Brit. Quarterly Review, vi. 1847.

Brownlow, Richard (and John Goldesborough's) Reports in C. Pleas temp. Elizabeth and James I., Lon., 1651, '54, '75, 4to. Latine Redivivus, 1693, fol. Surreptitious and imperfect copies were in circulation.

"Before the complete copy of 1693. They were trans. into English, and pub. in 1663; again with additions in 1664. In 1683 the book was republ. in the original Latin, with additions, because, the editor says, in 1663 and in 1664, these Entries were unskillfully turned into English. One of the translators, in speaking of the work, says, 'I may dare to promise, without the imposition of temerity, that allowing for human incidency, it may as justly claim the title of perfect as any thing of this nature hitherto published.'" —Martin's Legal Bibl.

Brownlow compiled several other legal treatises.

Brownrigg, or Brownrigg, Ralph, D.D., 1592-1659, a native of Ipswich, entered Pembroke College, Cambridge, at 14; Archdeacon of Coventry, 1631; was made Master of Catherine Hall, Cambridge, and Vice-chancellor of the University; Bishop of Exeter, 1642. He was deprived by the Parliament of the revenues of his bishopric, and of his mastership of Catherine Hall. The Parliament did not relish his plain discourses. Forty Sermons, 1652, fol.; reprinted with 25 others, making a second volume, Lon., 1665, 2 vols. fol. He had the courage to "advise Oliver Cromwell to restore King Charles II. to his just rights." But the "Protector" had no idea of so easily depriving himself of the "price of blood."

"He was a great man for the Anti-Arminian cause, (for he was a rigid Calvinist,) yet a mighty champion for the liturgy and ordination of bishops; and his death was highly lamented by men of all parties."—ECHARD.

"Dr. Gauden, who had known him above thirty years, declares that he never heard of any thing said or done by him which a wise and good man would have wished unsaid or undone. . . . He was one of those excellent men with whom Archbishop Tillotson cultivated an acquaintance at his coming to London, and by whose probing and example he formed himself."

"His style is tolerably good, and his sentences generally short. But he is too full of divisions and subdivisions, and of scraps of Latin and Greek: which was the great fault of the age he lived in."—Biog. Brit.

Dr. Gauden's eulogy is such a curious mixture of friendship and pedantry, that we must needs give it to the reader:

"He was a person of those ample and cubical dimensions, for height of learning and understanding, for depth of humility and devotion, for length of all morality and virtue, and for breadth of all humanity and charity, that it is hard to contract or epitomize him. He had the learning of NALIANAK, BARI, or JERON; the courage and constancy of ATTHANASIUS and ST. ABERNETH; the eloquence of ST. CHRYSOSTOM and CHRYSOLOGUS; the mildness and gentleness of ST. CYPRIAN or ST. AUSTIN; the charity and benignity of PAULINUS and MARTINUS."—Memorials of Bishop Brownrigg.

"He had wit at will; but so that he made it his page, not privy councillor; to obey, not direct his judgment. He carried learning enough in summate about him in his pockets for any discourse, and had much more at home in his chests for any serious dispute. It is hard to say whether his loyal memory, quick fancy, solid judgment, or fluent utterance were most to be admired, having not only summa but fulmen eloquentie, being one who did teach with authority."—Fulter's Worthies.

Brownrigg, William, M.D., 1711-1800, a native of Cumberland, studied medicine at London, and afterwards at Leyden, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1737. Art of Making Common Salt, Lon., 1748, 8vo. Considerations on Pestilential Contagion, 1771, 4to. Con. to Phil. Trans., 1753, &c. When the President of the Royal Society, Sir John Pringle, was called on to bestow upon Dr. Priestley the gold medal for his paper of Discoveries on the Nature and Properties of Air, he remarked,

"It is no disparagement to the learned Dr. Priestley, that the vein of these discoveries was hit upon, some years ago, by my very learned, very penetrating, very industrious, but too modest, friend, Dr. Brownrigg."

Dr. Brownrigg was undoubtedly the "legitimate father" of this class of discoveries.

Brownsmith, John. The Rescue, or Thespian Scourge, 1767, 8vo. Dramatic Timepiece, being a calculation of the Length of Time every Act takes in the Performing, in all the acting Plays at the Theatre Royal of Drury Lane, &c. &c., 1767, 8vo. It is said that books have been written about almost every thing, and it appears that Mr. Brownsmith determined to find a subject for his industry. If he could have accurately informed the public of all the evil effects in various ways produced every night by the theatre, and its many injurious influences, he would have been a benefactor to society indeed!

Brownson, Orestes A., b. about 1802, is a native of Windsor county, Vermont. He has been, in succession, a Presbyterian minister, a Universalist, a Deist, again a Christian minister, and is now a Roman Catholic layman.

Some attention was excited to Mr. Brownson's peculiarities by a series of articles in the Christian Examiner. In 1836 he gave to the world a volume entitled, New Views of Christianity, Society, and the Church. Two years later he commenced the publication of the Boston Quarterly Review, in which periodical the principal part of his writings have appeared. In 1843 it was merged in the Democratic Review, pub. in New York, to which Mr. B. engaged to contribute. His papers were not received with much warmth, and in 1844 he revived his periodical under the title of Brownson's Quarterly Review, which is still continued, largely supplied with Mr. Brownson's lucubrations. In 1840 he pub. an account of his religious experience, under the title of Charles Elwood, or the Infidel Converted. Mr. Brownson is a great admirer of the philosophy of M. Comté, as developed in the Cours de Philosophie Positive. A well-written notice of Mr. Brownson's literary character will be found in Griswold's Prose Writers of America.

"We have no doubt that Charles Elwood will aid many a doubter to a cheerful faith, and confirm many a feeble mind in the faith it has already professed."—Christian Examiner.

"The style of Mr. Brownson has some good qualities. It is commonplace, without purity, and destitute of any characteristic brilliancy or elegance; but it is natural, direct, and plain. It is that simple and unaffected manner which has the appearance of being formed, not upon any plan, but merely by practice and use."—R. W. GRISWOLD.

"The metaphysical talents of Mr. O. A. Brownson are well known throughout the United States. He is an able critic on mental philosophy; and the several articles which have appeared from his pen in the Quarterly Review are of a first-rate character."—Blakey's Hist. of the Philosophy of Mind.

Bruce, Michael, 1748-1767, a native of Kinross-wood, county of Kinross, Scotland, was the son of a weaver. His father designed him for the ministry, and sent him to the University of Edinburgh, where he made the acquaintance of the Rev. John Logan, who pub. a volume of his poems in 1770, three years after his decease. A second edit. was pub. in 1784, and they were afterwards included in Anderson's edit. of the Poets. Principal Baird put forth another edit. in 1807, and in 1837 they were again pub., with a life of the author, by the Rev. William Mackenzie, Balgedie, Kinross-shire.

"Had Bruce lived, it is probable he would have taken a high place among our national poets. He was gifted with the requisite enthusiasm, fancy, and love of nature. . . . The pieces he has left have all the marks of youth; a style only half formed and immature, and resemblances to other poets, so close and frequent, that the reader is constantly stumbling on some familiar image or expression. In Lochleven, a descriptive poem in blank verse, he has taken Thomson as his model. The opening is a paraphrase of the commencement of Thomson's Spring, and epithets taken from the Seasons occur throughout the whole poem, with traces of Milton, Ossian, &c. . . . The Last Day is inferior to Lochleven. . . . In poetical beauty and energy, as in biographical interest, his latest effort, The Kleggy, must ever rank the first in his productions."—ROBERT CHAMBERS: see Specimens in Cycl. of Eng. Lit.

"Though the poem on Lochleven contains little more than six hundred lines, it is astonishing with what a variety of landscapes it is decorated; these are for the most part touched with a spirited pencil, and not seldom discover considerable originality, both in conception and execution; they are not mere copies of still life, but abound in the expression of human passions and feelings, and excite the most permanent and pleasurable emotions. . . . Oh reader! bless the memory of the gentle Bard: and whilst the tear of pity trembles on thy cheek, mayst thou feel the glow of emulative hope, and learn to live like him."—Drake's Literary Hours, vol. iii. 325: read the whole of this interesting sketch.

Brunne, Robert de, or Robert Mannyng, a native of Brunne in Lincolnshire, was a Canon of the Gilbertine order, and resident in the priory of Sempringham ten years in the time of Prior John of Camelton, and five years with John of Clyntone. In 1303 he began his translation, or rather paraphrase, of Manuel Peché or Manuel des Pechés, that is, the Manual of Sins. It is a long production, treating of the decalogue and the seven deadly sins, which are illustrated by many legendary stories. It was never printed, but is preserved in the Bodleian Library, MSS. No. 415, and in the Harleian MSS., No. 1701. In this work he remonstrates upon the introduction of foreign terms into the language: "I seke," says he, "no straunge Englyss."

But a more important work of his is a metrical chronicle of England. The former part is trans. from an old French poet called Malster Wace or Gasse, who copied Geoffrey of Monmouth in a poem called Roman des Rois D'Angleterre. The second part of De Brunne's Chronicle, beginning from Cadwallader, and ending with Edward the First, is trans. principally from a Chronicle by Peter Langtoft, an Augustine canon of Bridlington, in Yorkshire, who is supposed to have died in the reign of Edward II., and was therefore a contemporary of De Brunne. Hearne edited De Brunne, but "has suppressed the whole of his trans. from Wace, excepting the prologue, and a few extracts which he found necessary to illustrate his glossary." Some specimens of De Brunne's style will be found in Ellis's selection; in Chambers's Cyc. Eng. Lit.; and in Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, in which work will be found some learned notes upon our author.

"The learned antiquary, Hearne, perhaps thought that having preserved the whole of Robert of Gloucester's faithful and almost literal version of Geoffrey of Monmouth, it was unnecessary to print the more licentious paraphrase which had passed through the medium of a Norman poet."—Ellis's Specimens of Early Eng. Poet., i. 92.

"I intended to show the power of the religious principle in bestowing self-command, and to bear testimony against a maxim as immoral as indelicate, that a reformed rake makes the best husband."—From a Letter by the authoress.

The work was very successful. The 1st edit. was sold in a month, and a second and a third followed. In 1814 she pub. Discipline, which also was successful. Her third work, Emmeline, she did not live to finish. It was pub., together with a memoir of the authoress, by Dr. Brunton, after her decease. An edition of her works has been pub. in 7 vols. p. 8vo. All of her writings have been trans. into French, and are highly esteemed on the Continent.

Bryant, Jacob, 1715-1804, a man of profound learning, was a native of Plymouth, in Devonshire, and was educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge. He accepted the post of tutor to the sons of the Duke of Marlborough, and attended his grace during his campaign as his private secretary. The duke gave further evidences of his esteem by securing to Mr. Bryant an annuity which he received until his death, assigning two rooms to his use at Blenheim, and presenting to him the keys of his celebrated library. Mr. Bryant revelled in these literary stores, and it is worthy of note, that as literature was the great passion of his life, so its pursuit in one sense may be said to have hastened his death. In stepping on a chair to reach a book in his library, his foot slipped, and grasping his leg, mortification ensued, of which he died, Nov. 14, 1804, at the age of 89. Mr. Bryant was wedded to his books and learned theories, and therefore never took a wife. His publications were numerous: Observations and Inquiries relating to various Parts of Ancient History, containing Dissertations on the Wind Euroclydon; and on the Island Melite, together with an Account of Egypt in its most early State, and of the Shepherd Kings, Cambridge, 1767, 4to. In this volume Bryant does not hesitate, though with great modesty, to enter the field against Bochart, Grotius, Bentley, Cluverius, and Beza. He contends that Euroclydon is correct, and should not be read Euroaquito, and the Island Melite of the last chapter of the Acts is not Malta. His arguments are considered convincing.

"An ingenious gentleman, whose name is Bryant, has proved, I think, very clearly, that the Isle of Malta was not the place where St. Paul was shipwrecked, but Melite, which lies in the Adriatic gulph, upon the coast of Epidaurus. He likewise makes it probable that we must give up Dr. Bentley's reading, and abide by Euroclydon."—Charles Godwin to Hutchins, Aug. 14, 1767.

"That very respectable author has demonstrably shown that the Malta where St. Paul was shipwrecked was not the Malta in the Mediterranean Sea against Africa, but the Melite in the Illyrian Gulf, because, &c."—Wm. Bowyer: Nichols's Lib. Anecdotes, iii. 47; but see the other side in vol. ix. 515.

His next and most important work, and the one by which posterity will decide upon his merits, was A New System, or Analysis of Ancient Mythology; wherein an attempt is made to divest Tradition of Fable, and to reduce Truth to its original Purity, Lon., 1774-76, 3 vols. 4to.

Mr. Bryant's object in this work was to prove the truth of the Scriptures, by tracing the earliest history of mankind, as related in the Bible, through the traditional remains of all nations. Arguing upon the theory that all languages must be branches of the one used by the progenitors of the human race, he conceived that the investigation of radical terms and philological comparisons would lead to the establishment of Scriptural History. His theory was an ingenious one, but Mr. Bryant's zeal was greater than his knowledge of oriental languages. Richardson and other scholars attacked some of his positions, and showed their erroneous foundations. A Vindication of the Apamean Medal; Archæol. vol. iv., and separately in 4to, 1775. Vindiciæ Flavianæ; or a Vindication of the Testimony given by Josephus concerning our Saviour Jesus Christ, 1780, 8vo. This argument was so convincing, that even Dr. Priestley declared himself a convert. In this year Bryant edited Wood's Essay on Homer, the MS. of which was left in his care. An Address to Dr. Priestley upon his Doctrine of Philosophical Necessity, 1780, 8vo. This was replied to by Priestley. Observations on the Poems of Thomas Rowley, in which the authenticity of these Poems is ascertained, 1781, 2 vols. 12mo. This was an unfortunate cause, but even when espousing error, Mr. Bryant would always elucidate much valuable truth. In 1783 was pub. The Marlborough Gems, under the title of Gemmarum antiquarum electus ex præstantioribus desumptus in Dactylothea Ducis Marlburgensis. Vol. 1st of the exposition was written in Latin by Mr. Bryant, and trans. into French by Mr. Maty; vol. 2d by Dr. Cole, and trans. by Mr. Dutens. At the request of the dowager Lady Pembroke, Mr. B. prepared, and pub. in 1792, 8vo, 3d edit., 1810, 8vo, Treatise on the Authenticity of the Scriptures and the Truth of the Christian Religion.

"Peculiarly adapted for men of education who wish to see the principal arguments in favour of Christianity condensed into a narrow compass."

Observations upon the Plagues inflicted upon the Egyptians, Lon., 1794, 1810, 8vo.

"A very learned and curious work on the Plagues of Egypt, in which this series of miracles is critically investigated, and shown to afford most convincing evidences of the divine mission of Moses."—Bishop Van Mildert.

"None can read this book without being gratified with the learned research which it displays, and the light which is thrown by it on the singular, and in some respects obscure, subjects to which it relates."—Osney.

"The same depth of thought, the same brilliancy of fancy, and the same extent of erudition, are proportionably conspicuous in this smaller production, as in the larger work of the Analysis of Ancient Mythology."—British Critic, O. S., iv. 35.

"Suggests some valuable hints for the illustration of this subject."—Beckwith.

Mr. Bryant had always been conspicuous for the independence of his opinions, and had excited the astonishment of the learned who were willing to take things as they had received them from their grandfathers. But what was their dismay when Professor Dalsiel's publication of Chevalier's Description of the Plain of Troy, elicited from the fearless Jacob, A Dissertation concerning the War of Troy, and the Expedition of the Grecians as described by Homer, showing that no such expedition ever took place, and that no such city as Phrygia existed, Lon., 1796, 4to. Great was the indignation of the Hellenists at finding their beloved city thus unceremoniously swallowed up by the rod of this skeptical magician. Determined not to yield without a struggle, Vincent, Falkener, Wakefield, and Morritt rushed to the rescue, and the vindicators of Troy fought indeed like Trojans. Mr. Bryant made but few converts, whatever may have been the justice of his cause. The Sentiments of Philo-Judeus concerning the Logos, or Word of God, &c., 1797, 8vo. In 1799 he answered Mr. Morritt's strictures upon his treatise on Troy, and in the same year addressed an Exposition on this subject to the British Critic. Observations on the famous controverted passages in Justin Martyr and Josephus. His last work was entitled Dissertations upon some Passages in Scripture, which the Enemies of Religion have thought most Obnoxious, and attended with Difficulties not to be surmounted, 1803, 4to. The difficulties referred to are those in the History of Baalam; Samson and his victory at Leshi; the sun standing still in Gibeon, and portions of the history of Jonah.

"On all these topics the author's profound acquaintance with the idolatries and mythology of the Heathen supplied him with many curious and important illustrations. If he has not removed all the difficulties, he has shown that they may be materially reduced."—Osney.

"On the whole, we have discovered in this work much learning, much ingenuity, and an uniform good intention; but truth compels us to add, that it displays a defect in judgment, and a too evident propensity to support a favourite hypothesis."—British Critic, O. S., xxv. 58.

Amidst all Mr. Bryant's learned inquiries, it may be said to his praise, that if at times speculation deceived or theory betrayed him, yet his great object was to advance the glory of God by promoting the salvation of man: to confirm our hope of a glorious immortality, by establishing the truth of that inspired record wherein we "think we have eternal life."

Bryant, John H., b. 1807, a brother of William Cullen Bryant, is a native of Cummington, Massachusetts. In 1826 he wrote a poem entitled My Native Village, which was pub. in the United States Review and Literary Gazette, of which his brother William was one of the editors. Mr. Bryant has been for some years a resident of Illinois, a cultivator of the soil. His poetical pieces have appeared in the periodicals of the day, and in 1 vol., 1858.

"He is a lover of nature, and describes minutely and effectively. To him the wind and the streams are ever musical, and the forests and the prairies clothed with beauty. Bryant, Lemuel, d. 1764, a minister of Braintree, Massachusetts, pub. a Sermon on Moral Virtue, 1747. Remarks on Mr. Porter's Sermon, 1750.

Bryant, William Cullen, one of the most eminent of American poets, was born at Cummington, Massachusetts, November 3, 1797. At the early age of ten years, he published translations from some of the Latin poets, and when only thirteen, wrote The Embargo, a political satire, which was printed in Boston in 1808. This remarkable effusion of precocious genius was so successful that a new edition was called for in a few months. At Williams College the youthful poet distinguished himself by his devotion to the classics and other departments of learning. He left college in 1812, was admitted to the Bar in 1815, and commenced practice in the village of Great Barrington, where he soon after married. His celebrated poem of Thanatopsis, was written when between 18 and 19 years of age, and appeared in the North American Review for 1816. His longest poem, The Ages, a survey of the experience of mankind, was delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard College in 1821. It was pub. with some other poems at Cambridge in 1821. His well-known poem To a Water-Fowl, Inscription for an entrance to a Wood, and a number of other brilliant effusions, were written whilst still a resident of Great Barrington. Ten years' experience of legal life, though rewarded with more than ordinary success, determined Mr. Bryant to devote himself to the more congenial pursuits of literature. He removed to New York in 1825, and in conjunction with another gentleman, established The New York Review and Athenaeum Magazine, in which appeared some of his best poems. In 1826 he became editor of the New York Evening Post, with which he has ever since been connected. In 1827 he was associated with Mr. Verplanck and Mr. Sands in the production of The Talisman, an Annual. Mr. Sands died in 1832, and Mr. Verplanck and Mr. Bryant edited his works. In 1834 he travelled for some time in Europe, and in 1845 and 1849, repeated his visit. He has embodied his observations on Europe and this country, in his Letters of a Traveller in Europe and America. A collection of his poems was pub. in 1832 in New York, and soon after in Boston; and Washington Irving receiving a copy of it when in England, caused it to be pub. in London, where it was honoured by several editions. In 1842 he pub. The Fountain and other Poems; in 1844, The White-Footed Deer, and other Poems; and in 1846 a handsome edition of his complete Poetical Works was issued by Carey and Hart, Philadelphia. Mr. Bryant's works are now published by Messrs. D. Appleton & Co. of New York, who have shown their usual good judgment and taste in issuing them in various styles to suit all purchasers. For the above facts we are indebted to Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America, to which the reader is referred for a fuller notice of this gifted author and his poems. As editor for the last thirty years of the New York Evening Post, a leading Democratic journal, and by his contributions to periodicals, in the shape of reviews, tales, &c., Mr. Bryant has proved himself as great a master of prose as he is of poetry. Whilst our space forbids any thing like an extended analysis of the great merits of Mr. Bryant's poetry, we shall not feel justified in closing this article without quoting some opinions which will justly carry with them more weight than any criticism of our own. A highly commendatory notice of the Water-Fowl, Green River, Inscription for the Entrance into a Wood, and Thanatopsis, will be found in the London (old) Retrospective Review—a periodical very chary of praise—for 1824. We extract a few lines:

"The verses of Mr. Bryant (the best of the American Poets) come as assuredly from the 'well of English undefiled,' as the finer compositions of Mr. Wordsworth; indeed, the resemblance between the two living authors might justify a much more invective parallel. It is quite idle to set up for America the benefit of a young language: she does not require it. She can stand upon her own ground even now; and it may be, that if we pursue our rivalry, we may (in some classes of literature) have in the course of time, no such overwhelming cause for exultation."

This compliment was elicited by Mr. Jefferson's remark—"When we shall have existed as a people as long as the Greeks did before they produced Homer, the Romans a Virgil, the French a Racine and Voltaire, the English a Shakspeare and Milton; should this reproach be still true, we will inquire from what unfriendly causes it has proceeded, that the other countries of Europe and quarters of the earth shall not have inscribed any name of ours on the roll of poets."

Mr. Jefferson here refers to the contemptuous assertion of the Abbé Raynal, that America had not produced a single man of genius. The depreciating query of the witty Canon of St. Paul's will immediately occur to the reader's mind, but is so trite that we are afraid to quote it.

The Retrospective Review still further remarks, "The Inscription for the Entrance into a Wood reminds us both of Wordsworth and Cowper." We make an extract from a long and interesting review of Bryant's poetry by one of the highest authorities in the language, distinguished for its contempt of mediocrity:

"His poetry overflows with natural religion—with what Wordsworth calls the 'religion of the woods.' This reverential awe of the invisible pervades the verses entitled Thanatopsis and Forest Hymn, imparting to them a sweet solemnity which must affect all thinking hearts."

After pointing out some faults in Forest Hymn, the reviewer proceeds:

"Thanatopsis is more original both in conception and execution; and we quote it entire, as a noble example of true poetical enthusiasm. It alone would establish the author's claim to the honours of genius. . . . It is indeed in the beautiful that the genius of Bryant finds its prime delight. He enshrouds all dead, inanimate things, in that deep and delicate sense of their seeming life, in which they breathe and smile before the eyes 'that love all they look upon,' and thus there is animation and enjoyment in the heart of the solitude. Here are some lines [Inscription for the Entrance into a Wood] breathing a woodland and (you will understand us) a Wordsworthian feeling: while we read them, as Burns says, 'our hearts rejoice in nature's joy,' and in our serene sympathy we love the poet. . . . That his writings 'are imbued with the independent spirit and the buoyant aspirations incident to a youthful, a free, and a rising country,' will not, says Mr. Irving, be the 'least of his merits.' In the eyes of Mr. Rogers, to whom the volume is inscribed, [edited by Washington Irving; Andrews, London, 1832, 8vo.] and in ours, it is one of the greatest; for we too belong to a country who, though not young—God bless her, aid Scotland!—hath yet an independent spirit and buoyant aspirations which she is not loath to breathe into the bosom of one of her aged children."—CHRISTOPHER NORTH: Blackwood's Magazine, April, 1832, p. 646.

"There is running through the whole of this little collection, a strain of pure and high sentiment, that expands and lifts up the soul, and brings it nearer to the source of moral beauty. This is not indefinitely and obscurely shadowed out, but it animates bright images and clear thoughts."—W. PHILLIPS: N. American Review, xiii. 380; notice of The Ages and other Poems, pub. at Cambridge, 1821, pp. 44.

"Others before him have sung the beauties of creation, and the greatness of God; but no one ever observed external things more closely, or transferred his impressions to paper in more vivid colours. A violet becomes, in his hands, a gem fit to be placed in an imperial diadem; a mountain leads his eyes to the canopy above it. On the whole, we may pronounce the book before us the best volume of American poetry that has yet appeared. The publication of such a volume is an important event in our literature. We have been too much in the habit of looking abroad for examples and models; and our poets, generally, have had the usual fortune of imitators,—their copies have fallen short of the originals."—W. J. SWELLING: N. American Review, xxiv. 502; notice of the edition of 1832, ibid., New York, 36c.

"His name is classic in the literature of the language. Whosoever English poetry is read and loved, his poems are known by heart. Collections of poetry, elegant extracts, school-books, National Readers, and the like, draw largely upon his pieces. Among American poets his name stands, if not the very first, at least among the two or three foremost. Some of his pieces are perhaps greater favourites with the reading public than any others written in the United States."—G. S. HILLARD: N. American Review, lv. 500. (Notice of edition of 1843, Wiley & Putnam, New York and London, 12mo, pp. 100.)

Can we better conclude our notice of the poetry of this distinguished American, than by the graphic picture of its merits drawn by the vivid pencil of the man whom the country and his age delight to honour?

"Bryant's writings transport us into the depths of the solemn primeval forest, to the shores of the lonely lake—the banks of the wild nameless stream, or the brow of the rocky upland, rising like a promontory from amidst a wide ocean of foliage; while they shed around us the glories of a climate fierce in its extremes, but splendid in all its vicissitudes."—WASHINGTON IRVING.

The only fault that we have to find with Mr. Bryant is that he has written so little, and has chosen to scatter his brilliance amidst a constellation of little poetic stars, rather than to concentrate the light of his genius in some immortal work, which should shine as a planet in the literary horizon to the latest generation.

Letters of a Traveller in Europe and America, N. York, 12mo.

"Mr. Bryant's style in these Letters is an admirable model of descriptive prose. Without any appearance of labour, it is finished with an exquisite grace. The genial love of nature, and the lurking tendency to humour, which it everywhere betrays, prevents its severe simplicity from running into hardness, and gives it freshness and occasional glow in spite of its prevailing propriety and reserve."—Harper's New Monthly Magazine.

Brydges, Sir Grey, Lord Chandos, d. 1621, called, "from his magnificent style of living," King of Cotswold, is supposed to have been the author of Horæ Subsecivæ, Lon., 1626, 8vo. Wood ascribes this work to Gilbert, Lord Cavendish. Malone is disposed to attribute it to William Cavendish. Thomas Baker, Dr. White Kennet, and Horace Walpole, consider its authorship a matter of great doubt, and Sir Samuel Egerton Brydges is evidently disposed to adopt it on behalf of the House of Chandos. See this knotty point discussed in Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors, Brydges's Memoirs of King James's Peers, and in Censura Literaria, 2d edit., vi. 192.

Brydges, Hon. and Rev. Henry. Sermons, 1701, '09.

Brydges, Sir Samuel Egerton, 1762-1837, "a man to all the book tribe dear," was a native of Wotton Court, Kent. He was the second son of Edward Brydges, Esq., of that place, by Jemima, daughter and co-heiress of the Rev. William Egerton, LL.D., Prebendary of Canterbury. He was educated at the Grammar School at Maidstone for four years, for five at the King's School, Cambridge, and in 1780 was entered of Queen's College, Cambridge. He was called to the Bar in 1787, but never applied with much zeal to its duties. In 1812 he was elected to Parliament from Maidstone, and continued a member until 1818, when he removed to the continent, where he remained residing at Paris, Geneva, in Italy, &c., until his death in 1837. We now come to notice a matter respecting which Sir Egerton (for so he is commonly styled) permitted few of his readers to remain long ignorant. After the death of the last Duke of Chandos in 1790, Sir Egerton induced his brother, the Rev. Edward Tymewell Brydges, to prefer a claim to the Barony of Chandos, upon the ground of alleged descent from a younger son of the first Brydges who wore that title. The House of Peers pronounced its decision in 1803, "that the petitioner had not made out his claim to the title and dignity of Baron Chandos." This was a death-blow to the ambitious hopes of the aspiring littérateur, and the effects of his disappointment were permitted to mar many pages of profound lore and rare beauty. It is not thought by those best qualified to judge, that any injustice was done to himself or brother in the premises. Those who are curious on this subject can refer to Mr. G. F. Belz's Review of the Chandos Peerage Case, Lon., 1834, 8vo, and to Sir Egerton's edit. of Collins's Peerage. Sir Egerton, notwithstanding this adverse decision, declared that he could assert his rights by Common Law; and upon this presumption he was wont to add to his signature "per legum Terræ B. C. of S." But in 1814 he received a more substantial honour in the shape of a baronetcy. In his novel of Arthur Fitz-Albini the reader will find recorded much of the author's sombre experience. Like Lord Byron, whom in some respects he resembled, Sir Egerton is continually presenting his own woful visage in his gloomy galleries. As a writer Sir Egerton has conferred substantial benefits on the literature of his country, especially in his researches in early English poetry. His publications were numerous: Sonnets and Poems, Lon., 1785-95; 4th edit., 1808, 8vo. The celebrated KENO and SILENCE, so highly commended by Wordsworth, appeared in this collection. The Topographer, a monthly miscellany, in conjunction with the Rev. Stebbing Shaw, April, 1789, to June, 1791, 4 vols. 8vo. Topographical Miscellanies, 4to, 1792; only about 200 pages printed. Mary de Clifford; a Novel, 1792, 1806, 8vo.

Copies of this 2d edit. have become so rare (1854) that a standing and oft-repeated order of the writer's remained for two years in London before it could be supplied. We know of but one other copy in the city of Philadelphia, in the library of Professor C. D. Cleveland, the intelligent author of English Literature, and English Literature of the 19th Century. A reprint in say four royal octavo vols., at about a guinea per volume, we predict would have a good sale. We also venture to suggest the reprinting of The British Bibliographer, and Restituta. Thereby an important benefit would be conferred on the present generation. To these three valuable works Mr. Joseph Haulwood was a large contributor. British Bibliographer, 1810-14, 4 vols. 8vo. Restituta; or Titles, Extracts, and Characters of Old Books in English Literature Revived, 1814-16, 8vo. We do not enumerate all the works printed by Sir Egerton at his private press at the mansion of his son, Lee Priory, near Canterbury. A list will be found in Martin's Catalogue of Privately Printed Books, pp. 379-404; and see H. G. Bohn's Guinea Cat., 1841.

"The number of copies printed there has in no case exceeded one hundred; and I have reason to believe that the complete sets fall short of thirty."—Sir Egerton Brydges to Dr. T. F. Duden.

See memoir in Lon. Gent. Mag. Not satisfied with this hydra-headed catalogue of his works, to which others might be added, our prolific author, who could write 2000 sonnets in one year, edited a number of works, and contributed to the Gent. Mag. and other periodicals of the day. Of the merits of his edition of Milton's poetical works, we have a weighty certificate from a learned student of Milton, the last editor of his poetical works:

"We are most deeply indebted to him for his labours of love upon our great Epic; for no critic, not excepting Addison himself, has had a more just appreciation of the genius of Milton, or has criticised him with truer taste or sounder judgment. . . . This I consider, on the whole, the best edition of Milton."—Cleveland's English Literature of 19th Century, Phila., 1863.

We append extracts from the reviews by the London and Edinburgh Quarterlies of his Autobiography. It will be observed that the difference of opinion is very considerable:

"Those who like lively and spirited sketches of men and manners, diversified with short critical digressions, sometimes wise, always clever, will find a large fund of entertainment in these volumes. We have perhaps bestowed more space on them than some readers may think they deserved; but the truth is, that Sir Egerton Brydges possesses the temperament of genius in as high perfection as any author of our times."—Lon. Quarterly Review, li. 363.

"The author before us is as intimately persuaded of the reality of his powers, of the solidity of his reputation, as if the loud hurrahs of the literary world were borne to his retreat. The amabillitas tunc (the delusion is too proud, too strong for ordinary vanity) cheats, soothes, flatters, to the verge of the abyss. All that criticism could prove, all that neglect—severest of all critics—could teach, fall vain and unheeded on the ears of a nature of this mould. Nursed in the tastes and habits of genius, it mistakes the tastes for the capacities; in the habits (making now no mistake) it feels its reward; and if the individual author were the sole concern of the critic, here we might stop at once, leaving him in unlimited possession of a delusion it would be idle and cruel to destroy."—Edin. Review, lix. 459.

"In this singular work [Autobiography] there are lofty conceptions enough to form a poet, and moral wisdom enough to make a sage. It is a book that to be estimated must be read with an honest and true heart; much must be forgiven, and much overlooked: but after all that is offensive and all that is eccentric is removed from the surface, there will remain a knowledge, a power, a feeling, and a perseverance, that must inspire respect and admiration. We hesitate not to say that in these volumes are some of the most beautiful passages that are to be found in English prose."—Lon. Genl. Mag., March, 1835.

"Liveliness of description of scenery and manners, couched in an easy and elegant style, has rendered these volumes extremely popular, notwithstanding they do not display much learning or knowledge, and are even sometimes superficial and inaccurate."—BRITANNICA.

Mr. Brydone makes a sad exposure of ignorance in his remarks on the Carrionco Recupero:

"These observations, in the present more advanced state of geology, are scarcely deserving of notice."

Buchanan, George, 1506–1581, an eminent historian and Latin poet, was a native of Killairn, county of Stirling, Scotland. He was sent by his uncle, James Heriot, to the University of Paris, where he applied himself to his studies with great diligence. After residing at this seat of learning for two years, the death of his uncle reduced him to such poverty, that he was obliged to leave the University, and enlist as a common soldier in the army of the Duke of Albany, then commanding the French forces in Scotland, and regent of the kingdom. After a few months' experience of military life, he attended the lectures of the celebrated John Major, and matriculated at the University of St. Andrew's. Major took his pupil with him to France, and in 1526 procured for him a regency in the College of St. Barbe, where he took B.A. in 1527, and M.A. in 1528, and gave instructions in grammar; at the same time acting as tutor to the young Earl of Cassila, with whom he returned to Scotland. On the death of his pupil, James V. appointed Buchanan preceptor to his natural son, James, afterwards the Abbot of Kelso, who died in 1548. Buchanan became an object of dislike to the Franciscans by two satires—Somnium and Franciscanus—directed against the licentious lives of some members of this order. Franciscanus was written by command of King James, who suspected several of the Franciscans of disaffection. Buchanan was arrested on the charge of heresy by Archbishop James Beaton, and confined in St. Andrew's Castle, from whence he escaped to England. Not meeting with encouragement from Henry VIII., he next visited Paris, where he found his old enemy, Cardinal Beaton. He now accepted a professorship in the College of Guienne, at Bordeaux, where he resided for three years, when he removed to Paris, and from 1544 to 1547 was a regent in the College of Cardinal le Moine. In the latter year he accompanied his friend Andrew Govea (late principal of the College of Guienne) to Portugal. He remained here unmolested until the death of Govea, when upon the charge of heresy he was confined in the prison of the Inquisition for a year and a half, from whence he was transferred to a monastery, to be educated in the faith of the Church of Rome. He says that here he found the monks moral in their deportment, but altogether ignorant of religion. Whilst secluded in this monastery, he composed his celebrated translation of the Psalms into Latin verse. After regaining his freedom he visited England, Paris, and Scotland, and was appointed by the Earl of Moray, Principal of St. Leonard's College in the University of St. Andrew's. He embraced the cause of the Regent Moray, and wrote a Detection, &c., charging Queen Mary with adultery and murder. In 1567 he was appointed Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which gave great dissatisfaction to many—it being alleged that, notwithstanding his abilities and learning, being a layman, he was unfitted for the post. He accompanied the Earl of Moray to England, and whilst there addressed some highly complimentary verses to Queen Elizabeth. The queen had no dislike to praise, especially from the pen of the learned, and she settled upon him a pension of £100. He had previously been appointed, in an assembly of the Scottish nobility, tutor to King James VI., and he proved his independence by conferring upon his youthful majesty an application of the birch, the fame whereof has come down to our day. He remarked of the Scottish Solomon, that he "made him a pedant because he could make nothing else of him." He met with a severe loss in the death of his patron, Moray, who was assassinated in 1570. In the next year Buchanan was appointed one of the Lords of the Council and Lord Privy Seal, which entitled him to a seat in Parliament. For the last years of his life he was much afflicted with, and confined to his house by, the gout, and employed his leisure in the preparation of his History of Scotland, which occupied him at intervals for 12 or 13 years. It was pub. in 1582, Edin., fol. The plainness of some of his strictures gave great offence to the king, and the author was summoned to attend the Council, but died before the appointed "day of appearance." The aged historian, who had led so troubled a life from the malice of his persecutors, felt little apprehension at this last display of hostility. When told that the king was highly incensed at his De Jure Regni, and his Rerum Scotiæ Historia, he replied that he "Was not much concerned about that; for he was shortly going to a place where there were few kings."

He ordered his servant to give all his money to the poor, and said that if those who survived him

"Did not think proper to bury him at their own expense, they might let him lie where he was, or throw his corpse where they pleased."

He was accordingly buried at the expense of the city of Edinburgh. After a life of more than ordinary hardship, thus was gathered to his fathers—and we trust to that peaceful haven "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest"—one of the most famous scholars whom the world has ever seen.

diman, Edin., 1715, 2 vols. fol., and another by Burman, Lugd. Bat., 1725, 2 vols. 4to. As a Latin poet it would be difficult to praise Buchanan extravagantly. He did more than imitate the classics: though "born out of due time," his family likeness was so strong, that a re-inspection of his title-page could hardly convince you that you were reading the production of a Scotchman of the 16th century. We quote some testimonies to his excellence as a poet and an historian:

"Buchanan has excelled all his brethren in the splendour as well as in the variety of his triumphs; he has rivalled the first favourites of the Roman Muse."

"Buchanan not only excelled all that went before him in his own country, but scarce had his equal in that learned age in which he lived. He spent the first flame and rage of his fancy in poetry, in which he did imitate Virgil in herods, Ovid in elegiacs, Lucretius in philosophy, Seneca in tragedies, Martial in epigrams, Homer and Juvenal in satires. He copied after those great masters so perfectly, that nothing ever approached nearer the original: and his immortal Paraphrase on the Psalms doth show that neither the constraint of a limited matter, the darkness of expression, nor the frequent return of the same or the like phrases, could confine or exhaust that vast genius. At last, in his old age, when his thoughts were purified by long reflection and business, and a true judgment came in the room of one of the richest fancies that ever was, he wrote our History with such beauty of style, easiness of expression, and exactness in all its parts, that no service or honour could have been done the nation like it, had he ended so noble a work as he begun, and carried it on till James the Fifth's death. But, being unhappily engaged in a faction, and resentment working violently upon him, he suffered himself to be so strangely biased that in the relations he gives of many of the transactions of his own time he may rather pass for a satirist than an historian."—Crawford's History of the House of Eds. quoted by Mackenzie.

"It cannot be denied but Buchanan was a man of admirable eloquence, of rare prudence, and of an exquisite judgment; he has written the History of Scotland with such elegance and politeness that he surpasses all the writers of his age; and he has even equalled the ancients themselves, without excepting either Sallust or Titus Livius. But he is accused by some of being an unfaithful historian, and to have shewn in his history an extreme aversion against Queen Mary Stuart; but his masterpiece is his Paraphrase upon the Psalms. In which he outdid the most famous poets among the French and Italians."—Trissier: Eloges des Hommes Savans. tome II.

It is pleasing to quote the commendations of learned foreigners: we give a few others:

"His style is fine and pure, and the historian appears everywhere to speak the truth, as far as it was known to him. . . . He has united the brevity of Sallust to the elegance and perspicuity of Livy; for these were the two authors that he chiefly intended to imitate; and I do not believe that any modern historian hath better succeeded in imitating the historians of antiquity."—Le Clerc: Bibliothèque Chrétienne.

"His History is written with so much purity, spirit, and judgment, that it does not appear to be the production of a man who had passed all his days in the dust of a school, but of one who had been all his lifetime conversant in the most important affairs of state. Such was the greatness of his mind, and the felicity of his genius, that the meanness of his condition and fortune has not hindered Buchanan from forming just sentiments of things of the greatest moment, or from writing concerning them with a great deal of judgment."—Thuanus: Hist. r. id. Bayle's Dict. We need hardly caution the reader against the ridiculous slanders quoted by Bayle.

The celebrated Montaigne refers to Buchanan as one of his domestic tutors, and the Marshal de Brissac sent to Piedmont to invite him to become preceptor to his son Timoleon de Cosé. It is amusing to notice the continued aversion of James VI. to Buchanan's History of Scotland. In his Basilicon-Doron he recommends his son to be well versed in authentic histories, but cautions him—

"I mean not of such infamous invectives as Buchanan's or Knox's Chronicles: and if any of these infamous libels remain until your days, use the law upon the keepers thereof."

We have seen that Charles followed his father's advice, and lost his head by neglecting the principles of the old schoolmaster's De Jure Regni. James never forgot the flagellations by means of which Buchanan quickened his intellectual perceptions. He used to remark, long after, of an eminent individual, that he "ever trembled at his approach; it minded him so of his pedagogue."

Richard Harvey seems to have felt somewhat of the same awe. In his Philadelphos, or a defence of Brutes and the Brutans History, in answer to our author, he thus excites his courage for the onslaught:

"Master Buchanan, though some call you the trumpet of Scotland, and some the noble scholar, yet I will be so bold as answer you larum, touching the history of mighty Brute."

George Eglisham had the effrontery to claim that his translation of the Psalms was superior to Buchanan's, and even appealed to the University of Paris to confirm the justice of his criticisms on his illustrious rival. Hereupon Barclay remarks, that

"It would be more difficult to find in Buchanan's translation any verses that are not good, than it would be to find any in Eglisham's that are not bad."

"The most applauded of Buchanan's poetical works is his translation of the Psalms, particularly of the 104th. This Psalm has been translated into Latin by nine Scottish poets. Eight of these translations were printed at Edinburgh, 1699, 12mo. together with the Poetic Duet of Eglisham with Buchanan."—GRANGER.

Mackenzie remarks that

"Buchanan executed this translation with such inimitable sweetness and elegance, that this version of the Psalms will be esteemed and admired as long as the world endures, or men have any relish for poetry."—Scott's Works.

"It is generally admitted that to Scotland belongs the honour of having produced the finest Latin version of the Book of Psalms. At a time when literature was far from common in Europe, Buchanan, then a prisoner in a foreign land, produced a work which has immortalised his name, and left scarcely any thing to be desired—as far as the beauties of diction and imagery are concerned—in a translation of the sacred songs. It is not meant that he has always faithfully represented the meaning of the original. He had not, perhaps, a sufficient stock of Hebrew knowledge to enable him to do so. His studies and attainments were more of a classical than of a Biblical character; and his principal aim was to clothe the sentiments of David in the elegant drapery of Horace and Virgil. There are twenty-nine different kinds of measure in the work, in all of which he shows how completely he was master of the varied forms of Latin verse. In many of the Psalms he has succeeded to admiration. The CIV. has frequently been selected as one of the finest specimens of sublime poetry. . . . A translation of Buchanan's Psalms into English verse was published by the Rev. J. Cradock, of Maryland, 1754, 8vo."—Orme's Bibl. Sac.

"If we look into Buchanan, what can we say, but that the learned author, with great command of Latin expression, has no true relish for the emphatic conciseness and unadorned simplicity of the inspired poet?"—DR. BEATTIE.

The treatise De Jure Regni apud Scotos is in the form of a dialogue between Buchanan and Thomas Maitland. The latter, represented as lately returned from his travels, complains to the former of the proceedings against Mary, Queen of Scots, for the alleged murder of her husband, Lord Darnley. Buchanan justifies his countrymen, and in the course of his arguments assumes grounds of a character so democratic as to astonish the public mind of Europe.

"This book of Buchanan's has been much traduced by some good kind of men, and passes for a very pernicious work. But, after a careful perusal, I cannot view it in this light: he only teaches that kings are not above the laws that they have sworn to, and that the people may oblige them to observe them, and that without this they are not bound to obey them."—Le Clerc: Bibliothèque Chrétienne.

"It has been reproached to this cultivated scholar that he gives his sentiments with too much liberty. I am surprised that so many critics have concurred in this censure. Is there a quality in an author so honourable, so useful, as that of expressing what he thinks? Is it proper that science and learning should be put in prison, and dis honoured by confinement and fetters? Mis erable is that nation where literature is under any form but that of a republic."—DR. GILBERT STUART.

"The dialogue of our illustrious countryman Buchanan, De Jure Regni apud Scotos, though occasionally disfigured by the keen and indignant temper of the writer, and by a predilection (pardonable in a scholar warm from the schools of ancient Greece and Rome) for forms of policy unsuitable to the circumstances of modern Europe, bears, nevertheless, in its general spirit, a closer resemblance to the political philosophy of the eighteenth century, than any composition which had previously appeared."—DUGALD STUART: 1st Prelim. Diss. 1th edit. Encyc. Brit.

His Rerum Scoti Historia has, according to the different politics of critics, elicited both warm commendation and strong censure. Its literary merit is beyond all cavil. We have already given some commendations of this work: we subjoin a few others:

"In his old age he applied himself to write the Scots' History, which he renewed with such judgment and eloquence, as no country can show a better."—ARCHBISHOP SPOTSWOOD.

But the archbishop disapproves of many of the historian's sentiments, whilst he lauds the author's genius. Dr. Robertson speaks much in the same strain:

"If his accuracy and impartiality had been, in any degree, equal to the elegance of his taste, and to the purity and vigour of his style, his history might be placed on a level with the most admired compositions of the ancients. But, instead of rejecting the improbable tales of chronicle writers, he was at the utmost pains to adorn them; and hath clothed with all the beauties and graces of fiction, those legends which formerly had only its wildness and extravagance."—History of Scotland.

"Buchanan is not sufficiently exact in his dates, nor does he cite his authorities: in some parts of his history he is rather too fond of the marvellous, and of putting fine speeches into the mouths of his great men, in imitation of the ancient historians, whose defects he has copied as well as their excellencies."—Le Clerc: Bibliothèque Chrétienne.

Conrig commends him as a man of exquisite judgment, and Bishop Burnet declares that "His style is so natural and nervous, and his reflections on things are so solid, that he is justly reckoned the greatest and best of our modern authors."—Hist. of the Reformation.

"The composition of his history betrays no symptoms of the author's old age and infirmities; his style is not merely distinguished by its correctness and elegance—it breathes all the fervent animation of youthful genius. The noble ideas which so frequently rise in his mind, he always expresses in language of correspondent dignity. His narrative is extremely perspicuous, varie-gated, and interesting; it is seldom deficient, and never redundant. His moral and political reflections are profound and masterly. He is ready upon all occasions to vindicate the unalienable rights of mankind; and he uniformly delivers his sentiments with a noble freedom and energy."—Dr. Irvine, in Encyc. Brit.; q. v.

When the Latinity of the writers of the English tongue is called in question by learned foreigners, it is no small satisfaction to be able to direct their attention to the illustrious poet of Scotland, of whom Bishop Burnet remarks that "In the writings of Buchanan there appears, not only all the beauty and graces of the Latin tongue, but a vigour of mind, and quickness of thought, far beyond Bembo, or the other Italians, who at that time affected to revive the purity of the Roman style. It was but a feeble imitation of Tully in them. In his immortal poems he shows so well how he could imitate all the Roman poets in their several ways of writing, that he who compares them will be often tempted to prefer the copy to the original."—Hist. of the Reformation.

We quote a few lines from an able and eloquent review of Buchanan's writings, from Blackwood's Magazine, vol. iii.; we commend the article to the attention of our readers:

"Of all the modern poets who have written in Latin, is there one who has stamped upon his verses the impress of genius rioting in its strength—the symbol of uncontrolled might—the full majesty of freedom? If such an one there be, who shall deserve, so well, the name of a Prometheus—the rival of creators—the conqueror of bondage? To those who doubt the power of genius to overcome even these difficulties, and achieve even these triumphs, we must address only one word—READ BUCHANAN."

We are not a little surprised at Mr. Hallam's estimate of the merits of Buchanan. Without denying him great merit, he thinks him much overrated. In thus taking ground against Henry Stephens, Scaliger, Baillet, and "all France, Italy, and Germany," this eminent scholar displays a commendable independence—the correctness of his judgment is another question—and he very modestly remarks,

"As I have fairly quoted those who do not quite agree with myself, and by both number and reputation ought to weigh more with the reader, he has no right to complain that I mislead his taste."—Lit. Hist. of Europe.

The distinguished critic considers that "Jonston's Psalms do not fall short of those of Buchanan," and he prefers the poem of the latter on the Sphere to any other of his poetical productions. "We must here, however unwillingly, bring to a conclusion our quotations from this most instructive and interesting volume, of which every page is pregnant with facts inestimably precious to the natural theologian,—offering, as we unfeignedly do, our sincere acknowledgments to Dr. Buckland for the industry and research he has devoted to the performance of his task, and for the commanding eloquence with which he has called forth the very stocks and stones that have been buried for countless ages in the deep recesses of the earth, to proclaim the universal agency throughout all time of one all-directing, all-pervading Mind, and to swell the chorus in which all creation 'hymns his praise' and bears witness to his unlimited power, wisdom, and benevolence."

Buckminster, Joseph Stevens, son of the preceding, 1784-1812, a native of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, displayed uncommon literary abilities at a very early age. He entered Harvard College in 1797, took B.A. 1800, and was appointed minister of the Brattle Street Unitarian Society in Boston, 1805. His ill health obliged him to travel in Europe in 1806-07. In 1811 he was appointed First Prof. of Biblical Criticism at Cambridge, but died before he had entered upon his duties. As a preacher and accomplished scholar, Mr. Buckminster attained, although so young in years, great reputation. Budgell, Eustace, 1685-1736, a son of Gilbert Budgell, D.D., a native of St. Thomas, near Exeter, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. Removing to London, he was entered of the Middle Temple, his father having selected the Law as a suitable profession for the display of the uncommon abilities of his son. But the young man had acquired a literary taste, which interfered with the requisite application to his new duties. He lacked sufficient self-denial to indite a Farewell to his Muse, (see BLACKSTONE, SIR WILLIAM,) and was far more disposed to cultivate her acquaintance. He had the good sense to seek an intimacy with Addison, also, first cousin to Budgell's mother, and his celebrated relative, who had been appointed Secretary to the Earl of Wharton, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, gave him a clerkship in his office. Budgell had now secured a position which with ordinary prudence would have insured him literary distinction and social advantages seldom accorded to one so young, but he unfortunately possessed a capacious and quarrelsome disposition, stimulated by an inordinate vanity, which rendered him miserable in life, and was the cause, in connection with an alleged crime, of a disgraceful death by his own hand. He drowned himself in the Thames in 1736. His unhappy temper was continually marring the zealous efforts of Addison for his advancement. The Duke of Bolton and the Earl of Sunderland found it impossible to aid one who was always fighting against himself by abuse of those who were disposed to serve him. To add to his troubles, he lost above £20,000 in 1720 in the famous South Sea scheme. Before Budgell had attained his majority he contributed several papers to The Tatler. It is not known which these were. To The Spectator he contributed the following papers, according to the enumeration of Dr. Drake, (distinguished by "X" in the first seven volumes,) Nos. 67, 77, 176, 150, 161, 175, 197, 217, 277, 283, 301, 307, 313, 319, 325, 331, 337, 341, 347, 353, 359, 365, 373, 379, 385, 389, 395, 401, 506, 564, 573, 581, 591, 599, 602, 605, 628; also a letter signed Eustace, in No. 539, to which list Dr. Bissett adds 570. To The Guardian, Nos. 25, 31.

In 1730 he became a contributor to The Craftsman, the formidable opponent of Sir Robert Walpole's administration. See BOLINGBROKE, LORD. Towards the close of 1732, he commenced a weekly magazine entitled The Bee, which extended to 100 numbers, forming 8 vols. 8vo. About this time occurred an event alluded to previously, which elicited one of the most poignant epigrams of Pope. Dr. Matthew Tindal was an intimate friend of our author's, and the latter is supposed to have had something to do with the publication of Tindal's Christianity as old as the Creation. The Dr. in his will charged Budgell to give to the world the second part of this infamous piece, and he also bequeathed to him the sum of £2100. Tindal's nephew disputed the will, and it was set aside, not without great injury to Budgell's character. The latter some time before had attacked Pope in consequence of a piece published in the Grub-Street Journal, which he attributed to the author of the Dunciad. Pope conceived that the opportunity for revenge had now arrived, and in the Prologue to his Satires thus stereotyped the alleged crime of his opponent:

"Let Budgell charge low Grub-Street on my quill,
And write what'er he please—except my will."

Budgell's translation from the Greek of Theophrastus's Characters, pub. 1713, was so creditable as to elicit the warm commendation of Addison in the 39th number of The Lover. In 1732 he pub. Memoirs of the Lives and Characters of the Family of the Boyles, particularly of CHARLES, EARL OF ORRERY, (q. v.) This work contains much valuable information concerning Irish affairs. The humorous Epilogue to Ambrose Philips's Distressed Mother, which was one of the most popular productions of the day, and kept possession of public favour for many years, although attributed to Budgell, is said to have been written by Addison. In addition to the works enumerated, he pub. a number of political and other pieces, and some Poems which are now entirely neglected. Budgell's style is considered to be a very happy imitation of that of his friend Addison; and Dr. Johnson declares that "Addison wrote Budgell's papers, or at least mended them so much that he made them almost his own"—but this opinion seems to have no higher authority than the endorsement of a loose surmise.

"To have entered with perfect accuracy into the conception and keeping of a character so original as that of Sir Roger de Coverley, is the still greater merit of Budgell. In this respect he is certainly superior to Steele; and his description of The Hunt in No. 116, in which the knight makes so delightful and appropriate a figure, is a picture that we would not exchange for volumes of mediocrity. The humour and wit of Budgell appear to advantage in several of his communications; especially in his Observation on Beards, (Spectator, No. 331); on Country Wakes, (No. 161); in his relation of Will Honeycomb's Amours, (No. 359); and in his detail of the effects of the Month of May on Female Chastity, (Nos. 366 and 393.) On this last subject he has copied the graceful composition and sly humour of Addison with peculiar felicity; and his admonitions to the fair sex during this soft and seductive season, combine such a mixture of pleasing imagery, moral precept, and ludicrous association, as to render the essays which convey them some of the most interesting in the Spectator."—Drake's Essays, vol. iii.

"These notes are not so much of a philological as of an explanatory nature. Bulkley, John. Sermon, 1697, 4to.

Bulkley, John, d. 1731, first minister of Colchester, Connecticut, was a grandson of REV. PETER BULKLEY (q. post.) An Election Sermon, 1713. An Inquiry into the right of the Aboriginal Natives to the lands of America, 1724, (reprinted in Mass. Hist. Coll.) A Tract on Infant Baptism, 1729.

Bulkley, Peter, 1583-1659, first minister of Concord, Massachusetts, a native of Woodhill, Bedfordshire, was educated at, and became Fellow of, St. John's College, Cambridge. Being silenced by Archbishop Laud, he came to New England in 1635, and was one of the first settlers of Concord, Massachusetts. The Gospel Covenant Opened, Lon., 1646, 4to. Bull, George, D.D., 1634-1710, a native of Wells, Somersetshire, entered Exeter College, Oxford, 1648; became minister of St. George's near Bristol; Rector of Suddington-St. Mary's, 1658; Vicar of Suddington-St. Peter's, 1662; Prebendary of Gloucester, 1678; Bishop of St. David's, 1705. Bishop Bull, for profound learning, knowledge of Christian antiquity, and eminent piety, was one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Church of England. Harmonia Apostolica; seu Binnæ Dissertationes, quarum in priore Doctrina D. Jacobi de justificatione ex operibus explanatur et defenditur, in posteriore consensus D. Pauli cum Jacobo liquidè demonstratur, &c., Lon., 1670, fol.; reprinted, Basil, 1740, 8vo; a trans. by Thomas Wilkinson, 1801, 8vo; and the Harmonia was pub. in Lib. Anglo-Cath. Theol., Oxf., 1842, 8vo. This Latin Dissertation was written eight or nine years before its publication. The author laboured to show

"That good works, which proceed from faith, and are conjoined with faith, are a necessary condition required from us by God, to the end that by the new and evangelical covenant, obtained by and sealed in the Blood of Christ, the Mediator of it, we may be justified according to his free and unmerited grace."

Bishop Bull endeavoured to exhibit this doctrine so as to "absolutely exclude all pretensions to merit on the part of man," but his statements were unsatisfactory to many, and were opposed by Dr. Morley, Bishop of Winchester, Dr. Barlow, Charles Gataker, Joseph Truman, Dr. Tully, John Tombes, Lewis Du Moulin, and M. De Maretz. The author, nothing daunted by such a host of adversaries, pub. his Examen Censuræ in 1675, in reply to Mr. Gataker, and his Apologia pro Harmonia, in response to Dr. Tully; repub. in Lib. Anglo-Cath. Theol., Oxf., 1843, 8vo. The reader will find an account of the controversy in Nelson's Life of Bull.

Defensio Fidei Nicænæ ex Scriptis, quæ extant Catholicorum Doctorum, qui intra prima Ecclesiæ Christianæ sæcula floruerunt, Oxon., 1685, 4to; a new trans. pub. in Lib. Anglo-Cath. Theol., Oxf., 1851-52, 2 vols. 8vo. This work, also in Latin, increased the fame of the author both at home and abroad, whilst it, of course, provoked great opposition from the Socinians. See Nelson's Life of Bull.

"Bull's Defensio is recommended by the erudition, exactness, and conciseness with which it is written, and by the neatness and elegance of its style. It is, perhaps, the best work which a person who seeks to obtain a clear and comprehensive knowledge of the R. Catholic Creed, can peruse."—CHARLES BRYAN.

"The doctrinal parts of the Christian religion are summarily comprehended in the Creeds which our Church has adopted into its service. You need (after Pearson) have no better help than Bishop Bull's Latin works in defence of the Nicene Faith."—MR. PREBENDARY KNOWLES.

"After Dr. Cudworth came Dr. Bull, author of the Defence of the Nicene Faith, a book that has rendered the writer of it very famous, not in England only or chiefly, but beyond the water. 'Tis composed in a style most truly Latin, with much vivacity of expression, with great vigour and subtlety of thought: in short, 'tis worthy of the noble argument of which he treats. This author, having studied the Fathers with an application, diligence, and observation almost peculiar to him, perceived that the schools have departed from that notion of the Trinity believed and professed by some of the principal Fathers."—The Unitarian author of The Judgment of a disinterested Person, &c., Lon., 1696, 4to.

The following testimony from the celebrated Bossuet deserves to be quoted. In his answer to M. Jurieu, he remarks that, if the learned treatises of Father Thomassin and the preface of Father Petau are neglected by the opponent of the eternal generation of the Son,—then

"I send him to Bull, that learned English Protestant in the treatise where he hath so well defended the Fathers who lived before the Council of Nice. You must either renounce the Faith of the Holy Trinity, which God forbid, or presuppose with me that this author hath reason."

We give some other quotations:

"The best books against the Arians, besides Bishop Pearson on the Creed, are Bishop Bull's works."—DR. WORTON.

Bishop Horsley commends the accuracy of Dr. Bull's citations from the Fathers of the first three centuries, "confirming the Church of England Faith, and refuting the Unitarian."

"On the subject of a sinner's justification before God, the views of this distinguished prelate were very incorrect, and have done immense harm; but as an advocate of the Catholic doctrine of the Trinity, declared in the Nicene Creed, he has few equals. He was a man of immense learning, the whole of which he has brought to bear on this important subject. His Life, by Robert Nelson, Esq., is one of the finest pieces of theological biography in the English language."—DR. E. WILLIAMS.

In both of the above opinions Mr. Bickersteth concurs.

Judicium Ecclesie Catholice trium priorum Seculorum de necessitate credendi quod Dominus noster Jesus Christus sit verus Deus, assertum contra M. Simonem Episcopum aliosque, 1694. In English, with Life, by Rev. T. Rankin, York, 1825, 8vo. This work (which is a defence of the Anathema, as the former was of the Faith, declared by the First Council of Nice) was sent by Mr. Nelson to the famous Bishop of Meaux, Bossuet, whose commendation of the preceding work we have already cited. This celebrated prelate transmitted

"Not only his humble thanks, but the unfeigned congratulations also of the whole clergy of France, then assembled at St. Germain's, for the great service he had done to the Catholic Church in so well defending her determination concerning the necessity of believing the Divinity of the Son of God."

But the Roman Catholic prelate could not but express his surprise that

"So great a man, so weighty and solid an author, could continue a moment without acknowledging the Church."

He begged to have this question resolved, and Dr. Bull, nothing backward in defending the apostolicity of the Church of England, drew up a treatise upon the subject, which did not reach Mr. Nelson's hands until just as he received news of Bossuet's death. The treatise was, however, published, Lon., 1705-07, 8vo, under the title of The Corruptions of the Church of Rome, in relation to Ecclesiastical Government, the Rule of Faith, and Form of Divine Worship: in answer to the Bishop of Meaux's Queries.

In 1703 Dr. John Ernest Grabe superintended an edition of his Latin works, (the author's age and infirmities disabling him from the effort,) pub. in 1 vol. folio. Robert Nelson, author of The Fasts and Festivals of the Church of England, a former pupil of Bp. Bull, pub. in 1713, 4 vols. 8vo, Seven Sermons and other Discourses, with an account of his Life; new edit., Oxf., 1816, 3 vols. 18mo; again, Oxf., 1840, 8vo.

"This Bishop's sermons are compositions of the highest order:—learned, forcible, and perspicuous, they always excite attention and reward it; they teach us that the practice of Christian duties can only be founded on the faithful acknowledgment of Christian doctrine."

A Companion for the Candidates of Holy Orders, or the Great Importance and Principal Duties of the Priestly Office, 1714, 12mo. Recommended by Bishop Burgess to candidates for Holy Orders. It is reprinted in the Clergyman's Instructor. Vindication of the Church of England, 1719, 8vo. Works concerning the Trinity, 1739, 2 vols. 8vo. Apology for the Harmony. Primitive Apostolical Tradition, &c., against Daniel Zwickler, a Prussian. Two sermons concerning the State of the Soul on its immediate separation from the Body, &c., with a preface by Leonard Chappelow, B.D., 1764, 8vo. The Rev. Edward Burton pub. a revised edition of the Bishop's works, 7 vols. in 8, 8vo, Clarendon Press, Oxf., 1827; again in 1846; in which will be found the Life of Nelson, with additions by Mr. Burton.

"His works are esteemed by the learned as one of the main pillars of orthodoxy."—ELIZABETH WATSON.

Perhaps we cannot better conclude our notice of this celebrated divine than by a commendation which may be useful as a hint in some quarters. Dr. Lupton gives the following character of Bishop Bull's sermons:

"He abhorred affectation of wit, trains of falacious metaphors, and nice words wrought up into tautologous, pointed sentences, without any meaning at the bottom of them. He looked upon sermons consisting of these ingredients—which should be our aversion, and not our aim—as empty, and frothy, and trifling; as inconsistent with the dignity of serious and sacred subjects, and as an indication of a weak judgment."—Letter to Robert Nelson in 1846, &c.

Bullen, George, an assistant librarian of the British Museum. Catalogue of the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Lon., 1857, 8vo.

"An accurate and well-compiled catalogue. The author, Mr. Bullen, has brought all his own Bibliographical knowledge, as one of the librarians of the British Museum, to bear upon his work. The Bible Society's library consists of about five thousand volumes, printed and manuscript, of which by far the greater part are presents. In cataloguing the Scriptures, the plan adopted in the British Museum has been followed; and copious cross-references have been given from the names of all editors, translators, annotators, &c. upon the Bible to the particular edition in which their labours appear. These cross-references, &c. greatly enhance the value of this catalogue."—T. H. HODGKINS, D.D., in a letter to the author of this Dictionary, Aug. 31, 1858.

Sir Francis Buller enlarged the work, and pub. it as above.

"Notwithstanding its defects, from the judicial station of the learned author whose name it bears, it has been regarded as a work of considerable authority. Bulwer, Rt. Hon. Sir Henry Lytton Earle, G.C.B., M.P., Privy Councillor, Diplomatist, and Author, b. 1804, is an elder brother of Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer Lytton. Sir Henry has filled several highly responsible diplomatic positions, with great credit to himself and honour to his country. An author, also, he has gained considerable reputation. An Autumn in Greece, 1824, p. 8vo. France, Social, Literary, and Political, 2 vols. p. 8vo. The Monarchy of the Middle Classes, 2 vols. p. 8vo, 1834-36. Sir Henry wrote a Life of Lord Byron, prefixed to a Paris edition of his lordship's works.

Bulwer, John, an author of the 17th century, wrote several books on Dactylogy, Dress, &c. Chirologia, or the Natural Language of the Hand; as also Chironomia, or the Art of Manual Rhetoric, Lon., 1644, 8vo. Philopocies, 1648, 8vo. Pathomyotomia, 1649, 8vo. Anthropro-metamorphosis, Man-transformed; or the Changeling, shewing the various ways how divers People alter the Natural Shape of some part of their Bodies, Lon., 1653, 4to. Of this curious and extravagant work an account will be found in Oldys's Brit. Librarian, 367-72, and in the Lon. Retrospective Review, N. 8, ii. 205-17. It appears that the author wrote several other works which he did not see fit to publish.

"From Bulwer's extravagance some illustration is thrown upon one portion of the history of human knowledge. He lived in an age of great learning and of little judgment; at a time when there was a voracious appetite for information, and when fact and fiction were indiscriminately gorged and devoured by all who sought for the reputation of learning."—*Lon. Bunyan, Humphrey. Epithalamium on a recent Marriage, 1812.

Bunyan, John, 1628-1688, is one of the most remarkable instances of the acquisition of great fame where nothing was designed but the simple discharge of duty. He was the son of a tinker residing at Elstow in Bedfordshire:

"For my descent then, it was, as is well known by many, of a low and inconsiderable generation, my father's house being of that rank that is meanest and most despised of all the families of the land."—Autobiography.

By his father's care, who taught him his own trade, he was placed at school, where he obtained the first rudiments of an English education:

"Though to my shame, I confess, I did soon lose that I had learned, even almost utterly, and that long before the Lord did work his gracious work of conversion upon my soul."

His youth gave little promise of the exemplary piety for which he was afterwards noted. Some of his modern biographers have taken strange liberties with the facts of the case, by seeking to represent his character at this period as much better than it really was. If we can believe his own words, he led a very dissolute life, and seems anxious to acknowledge his transgressions, that he might magnify the mercy which snatched him from the "horrible pit and the miry clay." Such instances of "Grace Abounding" are of great value, and should teach us never to despair of, nor cease to labour for, the reformation and conversion of the most vicious. He tells us, with his own simple pathos, the manner in which his conscience received an impression which led to the happiest results for his future character:

"As I was standing at a neighbour's shop-window, and there cursing and swearing after my wonted manner, there sat within the woman of the house, who heard me; and though she was a very loose and ungodly wretch, yet protested that I swore and cursed at that most fearful rate, that she was made to tremble to hear me. . . . At this reproof, I was silenced, and put to secret shame, and that, too, as I thought, before the God of Heaven; wherefore, while I stood there, hanging down my head, I wished that I might be a little child again, that my father might learn me to speak without this wicked way of swearing."

What an encouragement is this to reprove profanity, and, indeed, to proffer good advice even to those who seem the most unlikely to be edified! "Blessed are they that sow beside all waters." "Thou knowest not which shall prosper, this or that."

At the early age of nineteen, he married a wife "whose father and mother were counted godly." This connexion was of great advantage to him: his immoral habits were laid aside, and he was so much pleased with this improvement, that he tells us, "I thought no man in England could please God better than I." He was favoured with more correct views both of his own depravity, and of the justifying grace which is in Christ Jesus; and in the year 1653 he was considered qualified for admission into a Baptist congregation at Bedford. Two years later, on the death of the pastor, he was urged to preach to the congregation, at least for a season. He was eagerly heard both in Bedford and in the adjoining parts of the country. After preaching for some five years, Justice Wingate, who declared he would break the neck of such meetings, issued an indictment against him, which ran in these words:

"John Bunyan hath devilishly and perniciously abetained from coming to church to hear divine service, and is a common upholder of several unlawful meetings and conventicles, to the disturbance and distraction of the good subjects of this kingdom, contrary to the laws of our sovereign lord and king."

He was cast into Bedford jail, where were about sixty Dissenters, and

"Here with only two books,—the Bible and Fox's Book of Martyrs,—he employed his time for twelve years and a half, in preaching to, and praying with, his fellow-prisoners, in writing several of his works, and in making tagged laces for the support of himself and family."—DR. BARLOW.

Bishop Lincoln—to his praise be it recorded—procured his enlargement in 1672. He visited his religious brethren in various parts of England, exhorting them to good works and holiness of life; by these visitations, he acquired the name of Bishop Bunyan. When James II. issued his proclamation for liberty of conscience to Dissenters, Bunyan built a meeting-house at Bedford. He annually visited his Baptist brethren in London, where such was his popularity that the meeting-house was too strait for his hearers. During one of these journeys, he was overtaken by a violent storm of rain, from which he contracted a cold, which ended fatally, at his lodgings in Snow-hill, August 31st, 1688.

Bunyan wrote many works; it is said as many as he was years of age, (66), but is chiefly known by that wonderful production, "Pilgrim's Progress," the fruit of his imprisonment, and, we had almost said, valuable enough to reconcile us to the wickedness of that persecuting spirit that thus unwittingly educes good from evil. But, no; we abhor the crime, while we rejoice that it was overruled to such happy results. In accordance with what we esteem one of the most valuable features of our work, we shall proceed to give the opinions of various eminent authorities upon the merits of the best-known uninspired allegory which has been composed by the wit of man.

"It is not known," says Dr. Southey, (who has written the life of Bunyan), "in what year 'The Pilgrim's Progress' was first published; no copy of the first edition having as yet been discovered. The second is in the British Museum; it is with additions, and its date is 1678. But as the work is known to have been written during Bunyan's imprisonment, which terminated in 1672, it was probably published before his release, or, at latest, immediately after it."

It had reached the tenth edition in 1685! Bunyan, in the preface to the second part, published in 1684, complains that

"Some have of late, to counterfeit
My Pilgrim, to their own my title set;
Yes, others, half my name and title too,
Have stitched to their books, to make them do."

If not very poetical, this is sufficiently significant. The third part, denied to be Bunyan's, appeared in 1693. It has been suggested that the hint of the Pilgrim's Progress was taken from an allegory written by the Rev. Richard Bernard,—The Isle of Man; or Legal Proceedings in Manshire against Sin, Lon., 1627: this work seems to have been as popular as Bunyan's, having also reached the tenth edition in eight years,—1635. Bunyan's Pilgrim has been translated into almost every modern European tongue, and is perhaps the most popular religious work ever written.

"If this work is not a 'well of English undefiled,' it is a clear stream of current English, the vernacular speech of his age; sometimes, indeed, in its rusticity and coarseness, but always in its plainness and its strength. To this natural style, Bunyan is in some degree beholden for his general popularity: his language is everywhere level to the most ignorant reader, and to the meanest capacity: there is a homely reality about it: a nursery tale is not more intelligible in its manner of narration to a child. Another cause of his popularity is, that he taxes the imagination as little as the understanding. The vividness of his own imagination is such, that he saw the things of which he was writing as distinctly with his mind's eye as if they were indeed passing before him in a dream. And the reader, perhaps, sees them more satisfactorily to himself, because the outline only of the picture is presented to him, and the author having made no attempt to fill up the details, every reader supplies them according to the measure and scope of his own intellectual and imaginative powers."—SOUTHEY.

Mr. Ivimey, another biographer of Bunyan's, thus speaks of the basis of this allegory:

"The plan of this work is admirable, being drawn from the circumstances of his own life, as a stranger and pilgrim, who had left the 'City of Destruction' upon a journey towards the 'Celestial Country.' The difficulties he met with in his determination to serve Jesus Christ, suggested the many circumstances of danger through which this pilgrim passed. The versatile conduct of some professors of religion, suggested the different characters which Christian met with in his way; these, most probably, were persons whom he well knew, and who, perhaps, would be individually read at the time."

Bunyan seems to have been sorely perplexed by the conflicting advice of his friends as to the expediency or otherwise of printing his "little book:—"

"Some said, John, print it; others said, Not so;
Some said it might do good, others said, No."

Thus differently advised,

"Now was I in a strait, and did not see
Which was the best thing to be done by me."

He decided, as authors generally do in such cases:

"At last I thought, since you are thus divided,
I print it will; and so the case decided."

"Ingenious dreamer! in whose well-told tale
Sweet fiction and sweet truth alike prevail;
Whose humorous vein, strong sense, and simple style,
May teach the gayest, make the gravest smile;
Witty, and well employed, and like thy Lord,
Speaking in parables his slighted word;
I name thee not, lest so despised a name
Should move a sneer at thy deserved fame."—COWPER.

It is a curious fact that Bunyan's prison companion, Fox's Book of Martyrs, (his only book save the Bible,) was sold in 1780 to Mr. Wantner of the Priors; it was inherited by his daughter, Mrs. Parnell of Botolph Lane; and afterwards purchased by subscription for the Bedfordshire General Library. It is enriched with the poor prisoner's annotations, in rhyme, one of which we quote; it is a comment upon the account of Gardiner's death:

"The blood, the blood that he did shed
Is falling on his one [own] head;
And dreadful it is for to see
The beggars of his misery."

Bunyan had a talent for repartee. A Quaker visited him in Bedford jail, and declared that by the order of the Lord he had sought for him in half the prisons of England.

"If the Lord had sent you," replied the prisoner, "you need not have taken so much trouble to find me out; for the Lord knows that I have been a prisoner in Bedford jail for the last twelve years."

Mr. Granger remarks,

"Bunyan, who has been mentioned among the least and lowest of our writers, and even ridiculed as a driveller by those who had never read him, deserves a much higher rank than is commonly imagined. His Pilgrim's Progress gives us a clear and distinct idea of Calvinistic divinity. In the first part, the allegory is admirably carried on, and the characters justly drawn, and uniformly supported. The author's original and poetic genius shines through the coarseness and vulgarity of his language, and intimates that if he had been a master of numbers, he might have composed a poem worthy of Spenser himself. As this opinion may be deemed paradoxical, I shall venture to name two persons of eminence of the same sentiments; one, the late Mr. Merrick of Reading; the other, Dr. Roberts, now Fellow of Eton College.

"Mr. Merrick has been heard to say, in conversation, that his invention was like that of Homer."

Lord Kames makes a remark of a similar character; he describes the Pilgrim's Progress as

"Composed in a style enlivened, like that of Homer, by a proper mixture of the dramatic and narrative, and upon that account it has been translated into most European languages."

Dean Swift declared, that

"He had been better entertained, and more informed, by a chapter in the Pilgrim's Progress, than by a long discourse upon the will and intellect, and simple or complex ideas."

Dr. Radcliffe terms this allegory a "phoenix in a cage."

"Honest John Bunyan is the first man I know of, who has mingled narrative and dialogue together; a mode of writing very engaging to the reader, who, in the most interesting passages, finds himself admitted, as it were, into the company, and present at the conversation."—DR. FRANKLIN.

"Bunyan's Pilgrim was a Christian, but Patrick's only a Pedlar."

When Charles II. expressed his surprise to Dr. Owen that a man of his learning could "sit and hear an illiterate tinker prate," the doctor answered:

"May it please your majesty, could I possess that tinker's abilities for preaching, I would most gladly relinquish all my learning."

Mr. Conder, in his biographical sketch of our author, has vindicated him from some erroneous representations which he considers Dr. Southey to have made in his Life of Bunyan. In the good tinker's own day, "erroneous representations" of him were not unknown, for we find an account of a work with this most ungracious title—Dirt wiped out, or a manifest Discovery of the gross Ignorance, Error, and unchristian and wicked spirit of one John Bunyan, Lay preacher in Bedford, &c., Lon., 1672, by ——. But we forbear to give the author's name.

Those who desire to have a faithful account of the struggles and trials of Bunyan, should read his Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners; nor should The Holy War made by King Shaddai upon Diabolus, &c. be neglected. Of the Pilgrim's Progress Mr. Joseph Ivimey wrote a continuation, of which Lowndes thus speaks:

"The allegory is in many places singularly well sustained, and the performance is in every way creditable to the talents and information of the writer."

"Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and The Holy War are inimitable specimens of genius and humour in the service of experimental religion. His works display an original genius, depth of Christian experience, and much greater precision of thought and expression than might have been expected from a man who made no pretensions to literature."—DR. WILLIAMS.

"Bedford jail was that den wherein Bunyan dreamed his dream: The Pilgrim's Progress, a book which the child and his grandmother read with equal delight; and which, more than almost any other work, may be said to be

'Meet for all hours, and every mood of man,' was written in prison, where Bunyan preached to his fellow-prisoners, supported his family by making tagged laces, and filled up his leisure by writing a considerable part of two folio volumes. The work by which he immortalised himself grew from a sudden thought which occurred while he was writing in a different strain. Its progress he relates oddly enough in his rhyming apology, but more curiously in some verses prefixed to the Holy War:

'It came from mine own heart, so to my hand,
'And thence into my fingers trickled;
So to my pen, from whence immediately,
On paper I did dribble it daintily.'

These curious verses conclude with an anagram, made in noble contempt of orthography.

Witness my name: if anagram'd it be,
The letters make Nu hony in a B.

... Blind reasoners, who do not see that it is to their intellect, not to their principles of dissent, that Milton and Bunyan and De Foe owe their immortality! strange company, we confess, but each incomparable in his way."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"I know of no book, the Bible excepted, as above all comparison, which I, according to my judgment and experience, could so safely recommend as teaching and enforcing the whole saving truth, according to the mind that was in Christ Jesus, as the Pilgrim's Progress. It is, in my conviction, incomparably the best Summa Theologiae Evangelice ever produced by a writer not miraculously inspired. . . . It is composed in the lowest style of English, without slang or false grammar. If you were to polish it, you would at once destroy the reality of the vision. For works of imagination should be written in very plain language; the more purely imaginative they are, the more necessary it is to be plain. This wonderful book is one of the few books which may be read repeatedly, at different times, and each time with a new and a different pleasure. I read it once as a theologian, and let me assure you that there is great theological acumen in the work; once with devotional feelings; and once as a poet. I could not have believed beforehand, that Calvinism could be painted in such delightful colours."—COLERIDGE.

It is no slight evidence of the great merit of our author that critics of such opposite tastes in many particulars, vie with each other in commendation of the Tinker of Bedford. Hear Dr. Johnson on this theme:

"April 30, 1773. Johnson praised John Bunyan highly. His Pilgrim's Progress has great merit, both for invention, imagination, and the conduct of the story; and it has had the best evidence of its merit, the general and continued approbation of mankind. Few books, I believe, have had a more extensive sale. It is remarkable, that it begins very much like the poem of Dante; yet there was no translation of Dante when Bunyan wrote. There is reason to think that he had read Spenser."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"Perhaps there is no book, with the single exception of the Bible, that has been so widely diffused, translated into so many languages, and that is fitted to take so firm a hold of the minds both of old and young, of learned and unlearned, as the Pilgrim's Progress. Its unity of design and fertility of invention, the poetic fancy it displays, and the graphic faithfulness of the pictures it contains both of life and manners; these, together with its scriptural truth and great practical utility, have obtained for this delightful allegory a popularity no less great than it promises to be enduring. Its merits, indeed, are incontestable."—DR. JAMIESON.

"It is, indeed, one of the most extraordinary productions of any age or country; and its popularity is, perhaps, unrivalled. . . . Though upon the most serious of subjects, it is read by children with as much pleasure as are the fictions written professedly for their amusement."—MILLS.

"Bunyan is unjustly despised by some; his natural talents and evangelical principles and piety are admirable."—BICKNAP.

"In what then consists the peculiar charm of this strange and original fiction—a charm which renders the rude pages of Bunyan as familiar and delightful to a child as they are attractive to the less impressionable mind of critical manhood? It is the homely earnestness, the idiomatic vigour of the style; it is the fearless straightforwardness of the conceptions, and the inexhaustible richness of imagery and adventures."—PROF. T. B. SHAW.

"What an illustrious instance of the superiority of goodness over learning! Who now reads the learned wits of the reign of Charles the Second? Who comparatively reads even Dryden, or Tillotson, or Barrow, or Boyle, or Sir William Temple? Who has not read, who will not read, the immortal epic of John Bunyan? Who does not, who will not ever, with Cowper,

'Revere the man whose pilgrim marks the road,
And guides the progress of the soul to God?'

C. D. CLEVELAND.

"Disraeli has well designated Bunyan as the Sponsor of the people; every one familiar with his Fairy Queen must acknowledge the truth of the description. If it were not apparently incongruous, we would call him, in another score, the spiritual Shakespeare of the world: for the accuracy and charm with which he has delineated the changes and progress of the spiritual life, are not less exquisite than that of Shakespeare in the Seven Ages, and innumerable scenes of human life."—N. American Review, vol. xxxv.

"The style of Bunyan is delightful to every reader, and invaluable as a study to every person who wishes to obtain a wide command over the English language. The vocabulary is the vocabulary of the common people. There is not an expression, if we except a few technical terms of theology, which would puzzle the rudest peasant. We have observed several pages which do not contain a single word of more than two syllables. Yet no writer has said more exactly what he meant to say. For magnificence, for pathos, for vehement exhortation, for subtle disquisition, for every purpose of the poet, the orator, and the divine, this homely dialect, the dialect of plain workmen, was perfectly sufficient. There is no book in our literature on which we could so readily stake the fame of the old unpolluted English language; no book which shows so well how rich that language is in its own proper wealth, and how little it has been improved by all that it has borrowed. . . . We are not afraid to say that, though there were many clever men in England during the latter half of the seventeenth century, there were only two great creative minds. One of those minds produced the Paradise Lost, the other, the Pilgrim's Progress."—T. B. MACAULAY.

"The Pilgrim's Progress was so acceptable to the common people, by reason of the amusing and parabolical manner of its composition, by way of vision, a method he was thought to have such an extraordinary knack in, that some thought there were communications made to him in dreams, and that he first really dreamt over the matter contained in such of his writings. This notion was not a little propagated by his picture before some of these books, which is represented in a sleeping posture."—Oldys's MSS.

"He had the invention, but not the other natural qualifications which are necessary to constitute a great poet. If his genius had intended him to be any thing more than a poet in prose, it would probably, like Shakespeare's, have broken through every difficulty of birth and station."—DR. KIPPIS.

"The originality of Bunyan's genius is strikingly displayed in the Holy War. Indeed, the Holy War has no prototype in any language."—DR. CHREEVE; see his Lectures on Pilgrim's Progress.

Among the editors of Pilgrim's Progress and biographers of Bunyan may be mentioned Southey, Ivimey, Offer, Burder, Gilpin, Mason, Montgomery, Philip, Scott, Conder, and St. John. Bunyan's Works, 2 vols. fol., 1692, 1736, '37, '60, with Preface by G. Whitefield, 1767; 2 vols. fol., Edin., 1771; 6 vols. 8vo, with Notes by Mason, Lon., 1784, 6 vols. 8vo; best ed., by Offer, 3 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1853.

Oldys mentions it as the observation of the anonymous author of a discourse concerning Ridicule and Irony in Writing, printed in 1729, that Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress had infinitely outdone a certain publication which the author mentions, which perhaps had not made one convert to infidelity; whereas the Pilgrim's Progress had converted many sinners to Christ.

The Retrospective Review, in comparing Beaumont's Psyche with some of Bunyan's characters, remarks,

"As an allegory, Psyche is exceedingly meagre and inartificial: the heroine herself is a vague, featureless personification, and her attendants, Logos and Thelema, (the reason and the will,) are poor and lifeless compared with the bustling and dramatic personages of our old friend Bunyan in the siege of Mansoul.—My Lord Will-be-will, Mr. Recorder Conscience, and the rest."—Vol. xii.

The same excellent periodical considers that there are good reasons for the conjecture that Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress was suggested by John Carthemy's Voyage of the Wandering Knight, translated by Goodyears some years before Bunyan's imprisonment in Bedford jail. We shall only remark that, if a supposed or even real similarity between the productions of the human mind is to be accepted as a proof of derivation, then—to use a favourite phrase of Dr. Johnson—of such conjectures "there will be no end." There is, however, a striking resemblance between some of the adventures of the Wandering Knight and those of Bunyan's Pilgrim. See Retrospect. Rev., i. 250.

The author, after penetrating into the heart of the Continent to the depth of nearly eleven hundred miles, to a country never before described, met with obstacles which it was found impossible to surmount, and which compelled him to alter the original plan of his route. . . . Burckhardt, John Ludwig, 1784-1817, a native of Lausanne, Switzerland, arrived in London, July, 1806, with a letter from the celebrated Blumenbach to Sir Joseph Banks. In May, 1808, he was engaged by the African Association to make an attempt to penetrate into the interior of Africa from the North. He sailed from Portsmouth in March, 1809, and was engaged until the time of his death in making arrangements for prosecuting the object of his mission. He encountered great hardships, and at last, like Belzoni, fell a victim to dysentery, Oct. 15, 1817, when making preparations to commence his long-delayed journey to Fezzan, to explore the source of the Niger. His Journal and Memoranda, which he had partially prepared for publication, fortunately were preserved, and transmitted to the African Association, and were pub. in the following order: 1. Travels in Nubia, and in the Interior of North-Eastern Africa, performed in 1813; Lon., 1819, 4to. 2. Travels in Syria and the Holy Land, 1822, 4to. 3. Travels in Arabia, 1829, 4to. 4. Burckhardt has done much towards elucidating the manners of the Arabians, and communicating an idea of the real condition of that extraordinary people. . . . This work has thrown new light on the subject of Bedouin love, courtship, and marriage."—Edin. Rev.

5. Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians illustrated from their Proverbial Sayings current at Cairo, 1830, 4to. He bequeathed his collection of Oriental MSS. to the University of Cambridge.

Burckhardt combined some of the most essential qualifications for the life which he adopted. Had he lived a few years longer—he was cut off at the early age of 33—we should have possessed invaluable contributions to the stock of knowledge of a deeply-interesting character.

"A pious, learned, and able scholar, a good disputant, an eminent preacher, and a sound and orthodox divine."—Dr. JOHN WALTON, a pupil of Burgess.

Burgess, or Burges, Cornelius, D.D., a Nonconformist divine, d. 1665, was entered at Oxford in 1611. On taking holy orders he obtained the rectory of St. Magnus, London-bridge, and in 1618 he was presented to the living of Watford in Hertfordshire. He was chaplain in ordinary to Charles I., and a zealous friend to the Church in the earlier part of his life, but, as Wood alleges, from disappointment, he afterwards sided with the Parliamentary party, and after the murder of the king shared largely in the spoils; purchasing Church lands, and writing a book to justify such speculations, entitled No Sacrilege nor Sinne to Aliene or Purchase the Lands of Bishops, or others, whose Offices are Abolished, 2d edit., Lon., 1659, 8vo, (3d edit., abbreviated, 1680, 4to.)

"This second impression, as I apprehended, was wrote upon a prospect of the King's coming in, and danger of losing all; for it is wrote in a very mortified style."—Coll.

The king did "come in," and Burgess's speculations proved rather unprofitable:

"He was bid for his purchase, not long before the King's return, about £20,000, but refus'd it. And the King unexpectedly (to him) returning in the year 1660, and bishops and deans being restored, he lost all his purchas'd lands, and became so poor (ingross justitie divine documentum) that he had not bread to eat, as it appears in his own letter to Sir Richard Browne."—*Dr. BARLOW, in Athen. Burgess, Daniel, 1645–1712, a Dissenting divine, was entered at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1660. In 1667 the Earl of Orrery appointed him master of a school at Charleville, Ireland. The Golden Snuffers, a sermon on Exod. xxxvii. 23, 1697. Other theolog. treatises. Burgess was celebrated for a random wit which sometimes forgot the propriety of times and seasons and startled the pulpit with unseemly levity. Yet he had many occasional hearers from the theatre in his vicinity, and his lively zeal for souls made him ready to "become all things to all men." Perhaps the most unsatisfactory and reckless of the pupils upon whom his admonitions were thrown away was HENRY ST. JOHN, (afterwards) LORD BOLINGBROKE, to whom Burgess was for some time tutor.

Burgess, Thomas, D.D., 1756–1837, a native of Odham, Hampshire, educated at Winchester School, and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he obtained a scholarship in 1775, and a fellowship in 1783. He became Bishop of St. David's in 1803, translated to Salisbury in 1825. He was distinguished for industry as an author, and zeal in the discharge of ministerial duties. Whilst chaplain to Dr. Shute Barrington, his predecessor in the bishopric of Salisbury, he laboured assiduously in the promotion of that Christian charity—next to the ministry the most powerful instrumentality for the subversion of error and establishment of truth—the SUNDAY-SCHOOL system. The bishop was a very voluminous writer; his biographer, J. S. Harford, enumerates nearly 100 publications of his. To this biography, 2d edit., pub. Lon., 1841, 12mo, we refer the reader. The Divinity of Christ proved from his own Assertions, &c.; a sermon, 1790, 4to; of this doctrine the bishop was a zealous defender. He pub., 1814–20, a number of tracts on the Trinity, &c., which were collected into one volume in 1820; and in 1822 and 1824 he pub. Annotations Millii, &c., and a selection of Tracts and Observations on John v. 7, and wrote some treatises upon this question. The zeal of the bishop whilst espousing the genuineness of this verse drew him into a controversy with Professor Turton, who defended Porson against a charge made by the prelate. In 1747 he established a school at Stoke Newington, (removed to Newington-Green in 1750,) Middlesex, which was very successful. Burke, Edmund, 1738-1797, one of the greatest of the sons of men, was a native of Dublin. Mr. Prior agrees with other authorities in assigning January 1, 1730, as the date of his birth, but we adopt the decision recorded in the last edition of his works, (Lon., 1852, 8 vols. r. 8vo.), although his sister Juliana was baptised in this year. The family is descended from the Norman Burghs, or De Burghs, (of which Burke or Bourke—for it is even now spelt both ways—is a corruption,) who emigrated to Ireland under Strongbow, temp. Henry II. His father, Richard Burke, was an attorney, first in Limerick, and afterwards in Dublin. About 1725 he married Miss Mary Nagle, of the ancient family of that name, still existing near Castletown Roche, county of Cork. Of their fourteen or fifteen children, all died young except Garret, Edmund, Richard, and Juliana. In 1741 the three brothers were placed at a school at Ballitore, conducted by an excellent master named Abraham Shackleton, a Quaker. With this gentleman and his son Richard, his successor, Burke kept up the most friendly relations until the death of the son in 1792. As a boy, Edmund was distinguished for that devoted application to the acquisition of knowledge, and remarkable powers of comprehension and retention, which accompanied him through life. "When we were at play," remarked his brother Richard, "he was always at work." In 1744 he entered Trinity College, Dublin, as a pensioner. In 1746 he was elected a scholar of the house; commenced A.B., Feb. 23, 1747-48, and proceeded A.M., 1751. Goldsmith, who was his fellow-student, tells us that he was not distinguished for any remarkable superiority of talents; but the truth seems to be that he was zealously employed in laying in those stores of useful rather than brilliant knowledge, which afterwards proved of such service to him in the practical business of life. Yet he did not scorn the blandishments of the muse; for he composed very creditable poetry, and studied with delight the poems of Shakespeare, Spenser, Milton, and Young. Having determined to adopt the Law as his profession, he was entered of the Middle Temple, April 23, 1747, and early in 1750 arrived in London to keep the customary terms previous to being called to the Bar. He changed his views, however, for at the expiration of the usual time he was not called. In 1752 or 1753 he offered himself as candidate for the Professorship of Logic in the University of Glasgow, but, fortunately for the world and his future fame, was unsuccessful. It is said, indeed, that he withdrew his application when informed that arrangements had already been made by those interested which precluded any hope of his election. Mr. James Clow was elected to the vacant chair. Having much leisure upon his hands, Burke devoted it to assiduous study, occasionally amusing himself by original compositions. Some of his pieces were published, but it is impossible at this time to know what they were. One of the first, Arthur Murphy believed to be a poem, or poetical translation from the Latin. His first avowed publication, the Vindication of Natural Society, by a late Noble Writer, which appeared in the spring of 1756, 8vo, pp. 166, was a most successful imitation of the style, language, and thought of Lord Bolingbroke. The object was a most praiseworthy one. His lordship's philosophical (infidel) works had appeared in 1754, pub. by David Mallet, and excited much attention.

Burke laboured to show that if the abuses of, or evils sometimes connected with, religion, invalidate its authenticity, authority, or usefulness, then every institution, however beneficial, must be abandoned.

"His object was to expose his lordship's mode of reasoning, by running it out into its legitimate consequences. He therefore applied it to civil society. He undertook, in the person of Bolingbroke, and with the closest imitation of his impetuous and overbearing eloquence, to expose the crimes and wretchedness which have prevailed under every form of government, and thus to show that society is itself an evil, and the savage state the only one favourable to virtue and happiness. In this pamphlet he gave the most perfect specimen which the world has ever seen of the art of imitating the style and manner of another. He went beyond the mere choice of words, the structure of sentences, and the cast of imagery, into the deepest recesses of thought; and so completely had he imbued himself with the spirit of Bolingbroke, that he brought out precisely what every one sees his lordship ought to have said on his own principles, and might be expected to say, if he dared to express his sentiments."

The merit of this production was the better appreciated from the current opinion of literary men that Bolingbroke's style was "not only the best of that time, but in itself wholly inimitable." The critics were completely deceived:

"Almost everybody received it as a posthumous work of Lord Bolingbroke; and so far from being looked upon as one of the hasty sketches of his youth, or the gleanings of old age, it was praised up to the standard of his best writings. The critics knew the turn of his periods, his style, his phrases, and above all, the matchless dexterity of his metaphysical pen. Charles Macklin, with the pamphlet in his hand, used frequently to exclaim at the Grecian Coffee-house, (where he gave a kind of literary law to the young Templars at that time,) 'Sir, this must be Harry Bolingbroke; I know him by his cloven foot!' The Earl of Chesterfield, who had been an intimate friend of Bolingbroke, and was a copyist of his style, acknowledged that he was for some time deceived in this point; and Bishop Warburton—an abler man than either of their lordships—exclaimed in his usual rough style—'You see, sir, the fellow's principles; they now come out in a full blaze.'"

We need not be surprised at this when we remember that—to use the language of Mr. Prior—

"The imitation indeed was so perfect as to constitute identity, rather than resemblance. It was not merely the language, style, and general eloquence of the original which had been caught; but the whole mind of the peer, his train of thought, the power to enter into his conception, seemed to be transferred into the pen of his imitator, with a fidelity and grace beyond the reach of art."

A celebrated critic, alluding to the successful imitation of all of the noble writer's characteristics, remarks:

"In Burke's imitation of Bolingbroke (the most perfect specimen perhaps that ever will exist of the art in question) we have all the qualities which distinguish the style, or we may indeed say, the genius, of that noble writer, concentrated and brought before us."

This pamphlet was reprinted in 1765, with a preface by the author, in which he modestly remarks:

"If some inaccuracies in calculation, in reasoning, or in method, be found, perhaps these will not be looked upon as faults by the admirers of Lord Bolingbroke: who will, the editor is afraid, observe much more of his lordship's character in such particulars of the following letter, than they are likely to find of that rapid torrent of an impetuous and overbearing eloquence, and the variety of rich imagery, for which that writer is justly admired."

A few months afterwards, in the same year, appeared A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, 8vo; pub. by Dodsley. This Essay was received with great applause.

"Of this celebrated work, so long before the public, which now forms a text-book in liberal education, and one of reference in our universities, little more need be said, than that it is perfectly original in the execution and design. Longinus, indeed, had written on the sublime, and Addison partially on grandeur and beauty, but neither of them profoundly nor distinctly: they exemplify and illustrate rather than analyse, or dive to the sources of those impressions on the mind; and they even confound the sublime with the beautiful, on many occasions. But Mr. Burke's book marks the line between them so distinctly, as that they cannot be mistaken; he investigates the constituents and appearances of each scientifically, and illustrates his views with great happiness."—Prior.

"We have an example of true criticism in Burke's Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful."—Dr. Johnson.

"Though we think the author mistaken in many of his fundamental principles, and also in his deductions from them, yet we must say we have read his book with pleasure. He has certainly employed much thinking: there are many ingenious and elegant remarks, which, though they do not enforce or improve his first position, yet, considering them detached from his system, they are new and just. And we cannot dismiss this article without recommending a perusal of the book to all our readers, as we think they will be recompensed by a great deal of sentiment, a perspicuous, elegant, and harmonious style, in many passages both sublime and beautiful."—ARTHUR MURRAY.

Lord Jeffrey entirely dissents from the theory propounded by Mr. Burke:

"His explanation is founded upon a species of materialism.—not much to have been expected from the general character of his genius, or the strain of his other speculations,—for it resolves entirely into this, that all objects appear beautiful which have the power of producing a peculiar relaxation of our nerves and fibres, and thus inducing a certain degree of bodily languor and sinking. Of all the suppositions that have been at any time hazarded to explain the phenomena of beauty, this, we think, is the most unfortunate, and the most weakly supported. There is no philosophy in the doctrine; and the fundamental assumption is in every way contradicted by the most familiar experience. There is no relaxation of the fibres in the perception of beauty, and there is no pleasure in the relaxation of the fibres. If there were, it would follow that a warm bath would be by far the most beautiful thing in the world, and that the brilliant lights and bracing airs of a fine autumn morning would be the very reverse of beautiful. Accordingly, though the treatise alluded to will always be valuable on account of the many fine and just remarks it contains, we are not aware that there is any accurate inquirer into the subject, (with the exception perhaps of Mr. Price, in whose hands, however, the doctrine assumes a new character,) by whom the fundamental principles of the theory has not been explicitly abandoned."—Article "Beauty" in Encyc. Brit.; Jeffrey's Miscellanies.

Whatever may be thought of the correctness of Mr. Burke's theory, the practical value of his treatise to himself is not to be disputed, for it at once secured him the acquaintance of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Samuel Johnson, and other literary celebrities, whose congenial friendship formed no small portion of the happiness of his future life. In June, 1758, appeared the first number of the Annual Register, which, with the usual longevity attaching to successful English periodicals, is published to the present day. This review of the civil, political, and literary transactions of the times, is said to have been suggested to Dodsley, the publisher, by Burke. He conducted it for many years, and when no longer holding the pen himself, directed that of Mr. Ireland, his substitute.

Professor Smyth, in his lectures upon the American War, (one of the exciting topics which came under the notice of this periodical,) after recommending a number of publications of the day, remarks:

"They who are not at leisure to examine these books and pamphlets, will find the volumes of the Annual Register an excellent substitute for them all. They contain, in the most concise form, the most able, impartial, and authentic history of the dispute which can be found. The account is understood to have been drawn up by Burke, and if so, (and there is no doubt of it), the arguments on each side are displayed with an impartiality which is quite admirable."—Lectures on Modern History.

The health of the young author requiring relaxation, and the care of a judicious adviser; his friend and countryman, Dr. Christopher Nugent, an excellent physician, invited him to take up his residence in his own hospitable mansion, that he might be the better able to study his case, and administer to his medical wants. The good doctor had a lovely and most amiable daughter;—the rest may be readily imagined: the patient ventured to prescribe for himself—the disease having reached the heart, and requiring prompt measures—and in 1757 Miss Jane Mary Nugent became Mrs. Edmund Burke. The eulogy of this estimable woman may be written in one sentence of her husband's; he declared that amid all the trials, the conflicts, and the disappointments of political life, "every care vanished the moment he entered under his own roof." She who can thus convert her husband's "castle" into a palace of pleasure and "bower of delights," finds her priceless reward where she seeks it, in the affection of her husband; and in the present case, what higher honour could be coveted and acquired which could add aught of dignity to the proud title of—the wife of Edmund Burke! Two sons were the result of this happy union; Richard, who died unmarried in 1794, and Christopher, who was called away whilst yet an infant. It may be proper to mention here, that the present lineal representative of Mr. Burke's branch of his family is Thomas Haviland Burke, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, grand-nephew to Edmund Burke, and son of Lieut. Col. Thomas Haviland, by Mary French, daughter of Juliana Burke. In April, 1757, was published by Dodsley, An Account of the European Settlements in America, 2 vols. 8vo. Notwithstanding the many doubts expressed as to the authority of this work, we have no hesitation in ascribing it chiefly, if not wholly, to our author. Whilst it is admitted that the receipt for the copyright in his handwriting does not conclusively settle the question, yet the internal evidence of style is too strong to be easily resisted. That William and Richard Burke may have contributed to its pages is not improbable.

Dugald Stewart commends it as a masterly sketch, and Abbé Raynal has proved his admiration by the free use which he has made of it in his history of The Revolution of America, 1780.

"It is, in many parts, masterly; the reflections just, and often original, but paraded, perhaps, too formally and frequently before the reader, so as sometimes to interfere with the facts, or almost to supersede them. The style is what may be termed ambitious; aiming at depth, terseness, and brevity, yet too frequently betraying the effort."—Prior.

"And now I must allude, in a few words, to a celebrated and somewhat singular work, of which the title is, 'An Account of the European Settlements in America.' I would recommend the perusal of this work before the details I have proposed (the perusal of the Histories of Robertson, Baynal, and Marshall have been gone through; that is, I would recommend the perusal of it twice. It may be a map of the subject in the first instance, and a summary in the second."—Prof. Smyth's Lectures on Modern History.

The Essay towards an Abridgment of the English History, was pub. by Doddsley in 1757. Only eight sheets were issued, as the author abandoned the design, probably from hearing that Hume had taken the same subject in hand. Burke's Abridgment possesses no little merit, and it is deeply to be lamented that he did not pursue his intended plan.

"It displays a spirit of close research into the earlier history of our island, not exceeded, perhaps not equalled, by works of much greater pretensions, and with more antiquarian knowledge than could possibly be expected. . . . The style differs from that of the 'European Settlements' in aiming at less of point and effect, but possesses simplicity and perspicuity. On the whole, it is, perhaps, the best abstract of that remote period we possess, without any admixture of the fabulous stories so common to the age; and to youth it will be found particularly instructive."—Prior.

In 1759 the Earl of Charlemont introduced Burke to William Gerard Hamilton, more familiarly styled Single-Speech Hamilton,

"Who after a few able efforts in the House of Commons, gained more celebrity by afterwards keeping his tongue still, than many others by the most determined volubility."

In 1761 Hamilton accompanied Lord Halifax (appointed Lord-Lieutenant) to Ireland, and took Burke with him as his private secretary. Mr. Hamilton held the high official position of a Lord of Trade, and had diligently laboured to acquire that knowledge of the philosophy of commerce and principles of agriculture, which alone could render the discharge of his duties honourable to himself and useful to others. But a few conversations with his young secretary convinced him that, in future conferences, the master must consent to be scholar, rather than aspire to the post of instructor. The following remarks, extracted from the preface to the Thoughts and Details on Scarcity, presented by Mr. Burke to the Rt. Hon. William Pitt, are not without interest in this connection:

"Agriculture, and the commerce connected with and dependent upon it, form one of the most considerable branches of political economy; and as such, Mr. Burke diligently studied them. Indeed, when he began to qualify himself for the exalted rank which he afterwards held among statesmen, he laid a broad and deep foundation; and to an accurate research into the constitution, the laws, the civil and military history of these kingdoms, he joined an enlightened acquaintance with the whole circle of our commercial system. On his first introduction, when a young man, to the late Mr. Gerard Hamilton, who was then a Lord of Trade, the latter ingenuously confessed to a friend still living, how sensibly he felt his own inferiority, much as he had endeavoured to inform himself, and aided as he was by official documents inaccessible to any private person. He was also consulted, and the greatest deference was paid to his opinions, by Dr. Adam Smith, in the progress of the celebrated work on the Wealth of Nations."

In this station, his first public employment, Burke proved very serviceable, and in 1763 was rewarded with a pension of £300 per annum on the Irish list. This pension he voluntarily relinquished in 1764, on the occasion of a disagreement with Hamilton, the particulars of which are well known. In 1765 occurred an event which decided the future course of Burke's life, and introduced him to that seat in the national councils from which he so long instructed his countrymen by his wisdom, and astonished the world by the brilliancy of his genius. Mr. Fitzherbert recommended him to the Marquis of Rockingham, the leader of the Whigs in power, as a fit person for his private secretary, and his lordship appointed him to the post one week after he himself had been called to the head of the treasury. A cordial friendship sprang up between the marquis and his secretary, which continued unbroken until the death of the former in 1782. In 1766 Mr. Burke took his seat in Parliament as member for Wendover, a borough belonging to Lord Verney.

"It may be safely said that probably no man had ever entered Parliament so well trained and accomplished by previous acquirements, and by intellectual discipline."

It is not a little remarkable that on the very first day on which he took his seat, he astonished the assembled wisdom of the House with a burst of eloquence which elicited the warm commendations of the celebrated William Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham. He remarked that

"The young member had proved a very able advocate; he had himself intended to enter at length into the details, but he had been anticipated with so much ingenuity and eloquence, that there was little left for him to say; he congratulated him on his success, and his friends on the value of the acquisition they had made."

His friends, who had been his delighted auditors in the gallery, crowded around him—the faithful Arthur Murphy among them, almost beside himself with joy—as he emerged from the House, and congratulated him upon his brilliant success. The good news travelled fast, and soon gladdened "The Literary Club," of which Burke was the most brilliant ornament. One of the members, whose vanity had been wounded by being foiled in a controversy with Burke, expressed some surprise at the proud position before the country which the great orator had so suddenly assumed. This unworthy sneer was too much for the equanimity of the gruff yet warm-hearted author of Rasselas; he turned to the offender, and with bent brow vociferated: "Sir, there is no wonder at all! We, who know Mr. Burke, know that he will be one of the first men in the country!"

The delighted lexicographer seized his pen, and wrote to Langton:

"Burke has gained more reputation than perhaps any man at his first appearance ever gained before. He made two speeches in the House for repealing the Stamp Act, which were publicly commended by Mr. Pitt, and have filled the town with wonder. . . . Burke is a great man by nature, and is expected soon to attain civil greatness."

We shall have occasion hereafter to make some further quotations from Johnson's many attestations to the extraordinary genius of his friend.

We have now seen Mr. Burke fairly launched in public life, in which he continued until within three years of his death—his last appearance in the House of Commons occurring June 20th, 1794—and it is inconsistent with the plan of our work to enter into any detailed history of his political labours. These form an important part of the history of his country for a quarter of a century. Some of the principal we shall have occasion to refer to hereafter. We now proceed to notice some of the most important of Mr. Burke's publications. The edition of his Works and Correspondence, pub. by F. & J. Rivington, Lon., 1852, in 8 vols. 8vo, contains the whole of the 20 volumes previously published. A Short Account of a late short Administration, 1766. This, the author's first political pamphlet, is an exposition of the twelve months' administration of the Rockingham ministry. It was anonymous.

Observations on a late Publication entitled The Present State of the Nation, 1769. The Present State, &c. was the production of Mr. Grenville, or his former secretary, Mr. Knox.

"Mr. Burke fairly convicts his opponent of inconclusive reasoning, of inaccuracy in many parts of his subject, and of ignorance as to facts and details on the great principles of commerce and revenue, on which Mr. Grenville particularly plumed himself."—Prior.

The 5th edit. of this pamphlet was published in 1782. Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents, 1773. Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, 1777. This was a vindication of his line of conduct on the American Question. His Thirteen Propositions for quieting the troubles in America, had been submitted in March, 1775. His powerful advocacy of Colonial interests strengthened the heart and nerved the arm of the American patriots, and his exertions on their behalf were rewarded by a nation's gratitude. As early as 1771 the State of New York had appointed Mr. Burke its agent, an office which added some £700 per annum to his income. Reflections on the Revolution in France, 1790, in a Letter to a French gentleman. This work was translated into French by M. Dupont, and at once took a strong hold of the public mind of Europe. It was elaborated with great care, more than a dozen proofs being worked off and destroyed before the classical taste of the author was satisfied. Within the first year about 19,000 copies were sold in England, and about 13,000 in France. The first demand continued in England until 30,000 copies were absorbed; and some experienced booksellers have declared that the sale was greater than of any preceding book whatever of the same price, (5 shillings.) It has been remarked that perhaps no writer was ever before so complimented. The Sovereigns assembled at Pillnitz—the Emperor of Germany being of the number—the Princes of France, the Empress of Russia, and the King of England, hastened to honour that genius which dignified human nature and would have ennobled the lowest of the race. George of England—with all his faults, one of the best kings who ever sat upon the British throne—personally distributed the work he so much admired, with the emphatic commendation that it was "a book which every gentleman ought to read."

Stanislaus of Poland sent the author his likeness on a gold medal, with a letter written in English, "deeming that language the most copious and energetic to convey the high sense which he entertained of his patriotism and talents."

The venerable seats of that priceless learning which preserves the records of the experience of the past, that it may be converted to the wisdom of the future, vied with each other in their expressions of esteem for "the powerful advocate of the constitution, the friend of public order, virtue, and the happiness of mankind." The Doctors of Trinity College, Dublin, famed for profound indoctrination in the beauties and sublimity of the language of Cicero and Horace, reverentially laid their tribute at the feet of a master whose eloquence so much exceeded the loftiest strains of the one as his withering exposure of the crimes of an insane Democracy surpassed the biting satire of the other. The resident graduates of the University of Oxford—which from the time of Alfred has opened her gates to send forth, for the instruction of mankind, teachers profoundly versed in sacred and classic lore—presented their admiring acknowledgments to the champion who had so eloquently and ably defended those principles for the advancement of which it was their province to labour. The reverend dignitaries of the Church of England and France pronounced their benedictions upon one who, in an age of infidelity, exalted the inspiration of the written word, and pointed to the Cross of the Redeemer as the only infallible refuge for man amidst the calamities and disorders of a fallen world. Who indeed can peruse the Reflections without admiration of the genius, even if he question some of the sentiments, of the gifted author?

The publication of opinions so hostile to the English sympathisers with the French Revolutionists—soon registered—produced confusion in their ranks, and hastened that separation between Burke and Fox which sooner or later seemed inevitable. On the 5th of May of the next year, occurred that memorable scene—the rupture between those distinguished men—to the pathos and interest of which neither pen nor pencil can do justice. The subject before the House was the Canada Bill, and Mr. Burke opened the debate. Previous to the recess, Mr. Fox had, by implication, thrown out a challenge to Burke to discuss the vexed question of the French Revolution. Mr. Burke had no opportunity to reply before the next meeting of the House. In his opening speech he adverted to it, but was immediately called to order by Mr. Fox, as touching on forbidden grounds. Mr. Burke, surprised by this rudeness, attempted a reply, but was again and again interrupted by Fox, with whom others now joined, and Burke listened with artlessness and mortification whilst the late friend of his beamed on him with the bitterest irony and keenest invective, only made the more poignant by professions of unbounded admiration of his genius and abilities. Mr. Burke at length was allowed an opportunity to reply. He rose amidst profound silence, for there was something in that writhed brow, something in that eye, and in the tones of that eloquent voice which had so long "taught senators wisdom," and under whose rebuke the proudest nobles of the land had often stood abashed—something there was which told every hearing heart that this would be a day long to be remembered by the Commons of England. He complained of "being treated with harshness and malignity, for which the motive seemed unaccountable;—of being personally attacked from a quarter where he least expected it, after an intimacy of more than twenty-two years; of his public sentiments and writings being garbled, and his confidential communications violated, to give colour to an unjust charge; and that though at his time of life it was obviously indiscreet to provoke enemies, or to lose friends, as he could not hope for the opportunity necessary to acquire others, yet if his steady adherence to the British constitution placed him in such a dilemma, he would risk all, and as public duty and public prudence taught him, with his last breath, exclaim, 'Fly from the French constitution.'" Mr. Fox was alarmed at the consequences of his indiscretion; he whispered to the friend who had long loved and borne with him, "There is no loss of friendship!" "Yes, there is!" replied Burke; "I know the price of my conduct! I have indeed made a great sacrifice: I have done my duty, though I have lost my friend!" A painful scene now ensued. Fox rose in great agitation. He trembled at the results of his folly; and felt that his punishment was more than he could bear. In vain he essayed to speak, and he stood the picture of contrition before the House, until at last nature found relief in tears. He turned to the friend whose feelings he had so deeply outraged—that friend, too, one of the noblest of his kind: he conjured him in the most pathetic terms—by "the remembrance of their past attachment—their unalienable friendship—their reciprocal affection, as dear and almost as binding as the ties of nature between father and son,—he conjured him to revoke his renunciation and forget the past!" But, unfortunately, after all this burst of grief and affection, foolishly—unaccountably—for some demon seemed to have entered into Fox that unhappy day—he again gave loose to the frenzy which appeared to actuate him—and again and again offended. The breach was never healed.

In 1794 Mr. Burke was struck to the earth by a blow which robbed life of its attractions, and rendered him indifferent to the trappings of rank with which his sovereign had purposed to honour his declining years. In the spring of that year he had followed his only and beloved brother to the grave, and before autumn had changed the foliage of the woods, his son, an only son, was called to the "narrow house appointed for all living." Young Burke had accepted a post to Ireland, but "He was sinking into consumption, and his physicians detained him from his duties, not daring, however, to apprise his father of the danger for they knew that, like the patriarch of old, his life was bound up in the life of his son, and were convinced that a knowledge of the truth would prove fatal to him sooner than to his son. He was, therefore, kept in ignorance until a week before the closing scene, and from that time until all was over, he slept not, he scarcely tasted food or tasted from the most soothing lamentations." The last moments of young Burke present one of those striking scenes in which nature seems to rally all her powers to the approach of dissolution, as the taper often burns brightest in the act of going out. His father was waiting his departure in an adjoining room, (for he was unable to bear the sight,) when he rose from his bed, dressed himself completely, and leaning on his arm, entered the room where he was sitting. "Speak to me, my dear father," said he, as he saw him bowed to the earth under the poignancy of his grief. "I am in no terror. I feel myself better and in spirits; yet my heart suffers. I know not why! Pray talk to me—of religion—of morality—of indifferent subjects." Then, returning to his room, he exclaimed, "What noise is that? Does it rain?" "No; it is the rustling of the wind in the trees." The invalid then broke out at once with a clear sweet voice in that beautiful passage (the favourite lines of his father) from the Morning Hymn in Milton:

"His praise, ye winds, that from four quarters blow,
Breathe soft or loud, and wave your tops, ye plants,
With every plant, in sign of worship, wave!"

"He is departing & then can sweet the loved, in bosom it hover he: Eighteen poems, he Noble Lo them old I am still his praisers gloriously to it. . . . I am alive! I have mine to meet my enemies in the gulf." See Dr. French Laurence's Letter to Mrs. Harland.

It is hardly necessary at this day to do more than briefly notice the alleged identity of Mr. Burke with the author of the Letters of Junius. At one time it was generally believed that he was the author, and Mr. Roche made out so strong a case in his inquiry that even the quick-witted Anti-Jacobin Review was completely convinced, as the following verdict testifies:

"We feel it our duty before we enter into any particulars respecting this work to declare, that it has fully convinced us of the truth which it is intended to establish,—that the Letters of Junius were written by the Right Honourable Edmund Burke. Mr. Roche has, indeed, brought together such a body of evidence, internal, direct, and circumstantial, as must eventually settle this interesting and long-disputed question."

We shall not be expected to give any opinion upon a point on which most literary men have their own theory. The matter will be adverted to again in our notice of Sir Philip Francis. That Mr. Burke at least knew who the author was, we have good reason to believe,—but he "died and made no sign." We know an English gentleman who protests that he possesses the secret, and he may reveal something further.

Of all those speeches by which he acquired such renown, Mr. Burke prepared the following only for the press: 1. On American Taxation; delivered April 9, 1774. 2. On Conciliation with America; March 22, 1775. 3. On Economical Reform; Feb. 20, 1780. 4. At Bristol, previous to the Election; September 6, 1780. 5. On Dissolving the Election at Bristol; September 9, 1780. 6. On the East India Bill of Mr. Fox; December 1, 1783. 7. On the Nabob of Arcot's Debt; Feb. 28, 1783. All of these, with the exception of that on Economical Reform, will be found in the Rev. Dr. Chalmers's Goodrich's Select British Eloquence, where the reader may also peruse an admirable analysis of Mr. Burke's characteristics as an author and an orator. The great speech of July 16, 1794, On the Impeachment of Warren Hastings, Mr. Burke never prepared for the press. Mr. Macaulay has sketched the august spectacle of that day in colours but little less vivid than those which exposed the gigantic wickedness of the late Governor-General of India. He also does justice to the purity of motive and laudable philanthropy which actuated Burke in this prosecution, and properly rebukes the disreputable attempt of the reverend biographer (Gleig) of Hastings to impute petty malice to a mind too noble to harbour such an unworthy tenant. Of all the flattering portrait-painters of the age, perhaps the most successful in converting deformity into beauty are Mr. Basil Montagu, Sir John Malcolm, and the Rev. Dr. Gleig: see portraits of Bacon, Clive, and Hastings, as sketched by these great masters. We shall now, in justice to the illustrious subject of our notice, and that we may not be suspected of extravagance in the eulogies for which we are personally responsible, quote from the recorded opinion of a number of his contemporaries and successors:

"There never was a more beautiful alliance between virtue and talents. All his conceptions were kind, all his sentiments generous. . . . The sublimest talents, the greatest and rarest virtues that the beneficence of Providence ever concentrated in a single character for the benefit of mankind. But Mr. Burke was too superior to the age in which he lived. His prophetic genius only astonished the nation which it ought to have governed."—M. CAZALÉS.

"I do not reckon it amongst the least calamities of the times, certainly not among those that affect me least, that the world has now lost Mr. Burke. Oh! how much may we rue that his counsels were not followed. Oh! how exactly do we see verified all that he has predicted!"—WINDHAM.

"He must again repeat that all he ever knew of men, that all he ever read in books, that all his reasoning faculties informed him of, or his fancy suggested to him, did not impart that exalted knowledge, that superior information, which he had acquired from the lessons of his right honourable friend. To him he owed all his fame, if fame he had any. And if he (Mr. Fox) should now, or at any time, prevail over him in discussion, he could acknowledge his gratitude for the capability and pride of the conquest in telling him 'Hoc ipsum quod vincit id est tuum.'"—Mr. Fox's Speech in the House of Commons on the occasion of his rupture with Mr. Burke.

At the moment of proposing Mr. Burke's interment in Westminster Abbey, he again repeated the same acknowledgments in terms which, in the words of a member in attendance, "drew tears from every one present who had any feelings at all, or could sympathize in the excellence of the great genius before them, or with the still greater excellence of the genius who had departed."

"Burke understands every thing but gaming and music. In the House of Commons I sometimes think him only the second man in England; out of it he is always the first."—GERARD HAMILTON.

"The admiration, nay astonishment, with which I so often listened to Mr. Burke, gave an interest to every spot connected with his memory, and forcibly brought to my recollection the profundity and extent of his knowledge, while the energy, warmth, and beauty of his imagery, captured the heart, and made the judgment tributary to the will. As an orator he surpassed all his contemporaries, and was perhaps never exceeded."—CURWEN.

Another contemporary remarks:

"The political knowledge of Mr. Burke might be considered almost as an Encyclopedia: every man who approached him received instruction from his stores."

One who generally opposed him in politics acknowledges that "Learning waited upon him as a handmaid, presenting to his choice all that antiquity had culled or invented: he often seemed to be oppressed under the load and variety of his intellectual treasures. Every power of oratory was wielded by him in turn; for he could be during the same evening pathetic and humorous, acrimonious and conciliating; now giving a loose to his indignation and severity, and then, almost in the same breath, calling to his assistance ridicule, wit, and mockery."

Another political opponent remarks:

"As an orator, notwithstanding some defects, he stands almost unrivalled. No man was better calculated to arouse the dormant passions, to call forth the glowing affections of the human heart, and to 'harrow up' the inmost recesses of the soul. Venality and meanness stood appalled in his presence; he who was dead to the feelings of his own conscience was still alive to his animated reproaches; and corruption for a while became alarmed at the terrors of his countenance."

"His learning is so various and extensive that we might praise it for its range and compass, were it not still more praiseworthy for its solidity and depth. His imagination is so lively and so creative, that he may justly be called the child of fancy; and, therefore, his enemies, for even he is not without them, would persuade us that his fancy overbears his judgment. . . . His grand characteristic is genius, and his ruling faculty is judgment. . . . Whilst he persuades as an orator, he instructs as a philosopher."—REV. THOMAS CAMPBELL, author of the History of Ireland.

"Of his talents and acquisitions in general, it is unnecessary to speak. They were long the glory of his country and the admiration of Europe; they might have been (had it consisted with the inscrutable counsels of Divine Providence) the salvation of both. If not the most accomplished orator, yet the most eloquent man of his age, perhaps second to none in any age, he had still more wisdom than eloquence. He diligently collected it from the wise of all ages; but what he had so obtained he enriched from the vast treasury of his own observation."—DR. FRENCH LAURENCE.

"I admire his eloquence; I approve his politics; I adore his chivalry; and I can almost forgive his reverence for church establishments."—EDWARD GIBSON.

"When he has roused us with the thunders of his eloquence, he can at once, Timotheus-like, choose a melancholy theme, and melt us into pity: there is grace in his anger, for he can inveigh without vulgarity; he can modulate the strongest burst of passion, for even in his madness there is music."—CUMBERLAND.

"That volume of voice, that superabundant richness and fertility of fancy, that vast grasp and range of mind, which Mr. Burke possessed beyond all created beings."

On one occasion Mr. Shackleton, after listening to some of Burke's conversational eloquence, remarked aside to the orator's son, "He is the greatest man of the age." "He is," replied the son, with filial enthusiasm, "the greatest man of any age!" It is to be here observed that Burke, with that remarkable modesty which so eminently distinguished him, and which prevented his making a collection of his writings, considered his son's talents as far superior to his own. Wilberforce remarked:

"His eloquence had always attracted, his imagination continually charmed, his reasonings often convinced, him. Of his head and his heart, of his abilities and of his humanity, of his rectitude and perseverance, no man could entertain a higher opinion than he did."

"When the public mind was darkened that it could not discern, when in every quarter of the heaven appeared vapour and mist and cloud and exhalation, at this very hour the morning horizon began suddenly to reddens: it was the dawn. Then, indeed,

'First in his east the glorious lamp was seen,

Regent of day!'

That luminary was EDMUND BURKE. . . . I would record in lasting characters, and in our holiest and most honourable temple, the departed Orator of England, the Statesman and the Christian, EDMUND BURKE. Remuneratio ejus Cum Altissimo!"—Pursuits of Literature.

"The name of Burke will be remembered with admiration when those of Pitt and Fox will be comparatively forgotten."—LOUIS THURLOW.

"Let me speak what my mind prompts of the eloquence of Burke; of Burke, by whose sweetness Athens herself would have been soothed, with whose amplitude and exuberance she would have been enraptured, and on whose lips that prolific mother of genius and science would have adored, confessed, the Goddess of Persuasion. . . . Who is there among men of eloquence or learning more profoundly versed in every branch of science? Who is there that has cultivated philosophy, the parent of all that is illustrious in literature or exploit, with more felicitous success? . . . Who is there that combines the charm of invisible grace and urbanity with such magnificent and boundless expansion?"—DR. PARR. See these opinions and others in Prior's Life of Burke.

In conversation Burke was as unrivalled as in oratory. Johnson was the first man in the literary circles of London when Burke was absent, but he knew himself to be only second in the presence of Burke. It was a "striking spectacle to see one so proud and stubborn, who had for years been accustomed to give forth his dicta with the authority of an oracle, submit to contradiction from a youth of twenty-seven. But though Johnson differed from Burke in politics, he always did him justice. He spoke of him from the first in terms of the highest respect." He remarked to Boswell:

"I do not grudge Burke's being the first man in the House of Commons, for he is the first everywhere." 'Burke,' he remarked upon another occasion, 'is an extraordinary man. His stream of talk is perpetual; and he does not talk from any desire of distinction, but because his mind is full. . . . He is the only man whose common conversation corresponds with the general fame which he has in the world. Take him up where you please, he is ready to meet you. . . . No man of sense could meet Burke by accident under a gateway, to avoid a shower, without being convinced that he was the first man in England.'

"A striking confirmation of this remark occurred some years after, when Mr. Burke was passing through Lichfield, the birth-place of Johnson. Wishing to see the Cathedral, during the change of horses, he stepped into the building, and was met by one of the clergy of the place, who kindly offered to point out the principal objects of curiosity. A conversation ensued, but in a few moments the clergyman's pride of local information was completely subdued by the copious and intricate knowledge displayed by the stranger. Whatever topic the objects before them suggested, whether the theme was architecture or antiquities, some obscure passage in ecclesiastical history, or some question respecting the life of a saint, he touched it as with a sunbeam. His information appeared universal; his mind, clear intellect, without one particle of ignorance. A few minutes after their separation, the clergyman was met hurrying through the street. 'I have had,' said he, 'quite an adventure. I have been conversing for this half hour past with a man of the most extraordinary powers of mind and extent of information which it has ever been my fortune to meet with; and I am now going to the Inn to ascertain, if possible, who this stranger is.' Johnson considered that he would have excited as much wonder in much lower company. 'If he should go into a stable, and talk a few minutes with the hostlers about horses, they would venerate him as the wisest of human beings. They would say, We have had an extraordinary man here.' . . . In speaking of Mr. Burke's social hours, the late Mr. Grattan observed to several friends, that he was the greatest man in conversation he had met with. A nobleman who was present (Lord C.) inquired whether he did not think Curran on some occasions greater. 'No, my Lord,' was the reply: 'Curran indeed had much wit; but Burke had wit too, and, in addition to wit, boundless stores of wisdom and knowledge.'

When some one eulogized Johnson's powers of conversation, "But," replied Goldsmith, "is he like Burke, who winds in his subject like a serpent?"

It is worth noticing here that Mr. Burke himself considered Mrs. Anne Pitt, sister of the minister at the head of the cabinet, as "the most perfectly eloquent person he ever heard speak. He lamented not having committed to paper one particular conversation in which the richness and variety of her discourse quite astonished him." We hope that our readers will appreciate the gallantry which causes us to introduce this anecdote.

"It would not be difficult to multiply evidences of the vast stores of knowledge which Mr. Burke seems to have always had on hand ready for use at a moment's notice. On one occasion he dined with a party, where he met with an ecclesiastical dignitary who surprised the company by starting 'subjects of conversation so abstruse or unusual, that few of his hearers felt inclined or qualified to accompany him.' Mr. Burke said nothing for some time; but when the gentleman committed an error in his detail of some of the operations of Caesar in Britain, he immediately corrected him; the clergyman bowed without making any reply. He then brought up for discussion the merits of some obscure Latin authors, and was giving a quotation, when Mr. Burke reminded him that he had not rendered properly two or three words of the sentence. Again he introduced to the notice of the company a description of a rare old volume, 'containing some curious geographical details.' Here at least he was safe from the formidable critic! Not at all: Mr. Burke took the subject out of his hands, and commented on it as if it had been an every-day matter.

"At the conclusion of the evening Mr. Richards and the Archdeacon walked home together. 'Sir,' observed the former, 'I admired your patience when so repeatedly, and I dare say, unnecessarily, interrupted by Mr. Burke; for, from the nature of your studies, you must be a more competent judge of such matters than the bustle of politics can permit him to be.' 'Mr. Burke was nevertheless right, and I was wrong,' replied the Archdeacon: 'nay more; I confess I went previously prepared to speak on these subjects, for knowing that I was to meet him, and hearing that he was acquainted with almost every thing, I had determined to put his knowledge to the test, and for this purpose had spent much of the morning in my study. My memory, however, has been more treacherous than I had imagined.'

If the mere perusal of Burke's speeches affect us so powerfully, what must have been the emotions of his auditory! The Duke de Levis heard one of his philippics against the French Revolution, and he declares that

"This extraordinary man seemed to raise and quell the passions of his auditory with as much ease and as rapidly as a skilful musician passes into the various modulations of his harpsichord. I have witnessed many, too many, political assemblages, and striking scenes, where eloquence performed a noble part, but the whole of them appear insipid when compared with this amazing effort."

When he painted the cruelties of Debi Sing in his speech on the impeachment of Warren Hastings, the writer of the History of the Trial tells us

"In this part of his speech Mr. Burke's descriptions were more vivid, more harrowing, and more horrid, than human utterance, or either fact or fancy, perhaps ever formed before. The agitation of most people was very apparent: Mrs. Sheridan was so overpowered that she fainted: several others were as powerfully affected."

Mrs. Siddons is said to have been one of the number thus overcome by a mightier eloquence than any known to the stage.

The "finty chancellor," Lord Thurlow, albeit unused to the melting mood, was so visibly affected, that "iron tears down Pluto's cheek" was very near to being something more than a simile of the orator's.

"In his address to the Peers, some days afterwards, he concluded a handsome eulogium on the speech, by observing that their 'Lordships all knew the effect upon the auditors, many of whom had not to that moment, and perhaps never would, recover from the shock it had occasioned.'

"The testimony of the accused party himself is perhaps the strongest ever borne to the powers of any speaker of any country. 'For half an hour,' said Mr. Hastings, 'I looked up at the orator in a reverie of wonder; and during that space I actually felt myself the most culpable man on earth; adding, however, 'but I returned to my own bosom, and there found a consciousness that consoled me under all I heard and all I suffered.'—Prior's Life of Burke.

Was there ever an instance of such exquisite hypocrisy, or of such utter callousness of soul? But we leave this moral phenomena for Dr. Gleig's anatomical powers. It was enough to excite a momentary pang of remorse even in the finty heart of that man of blood and spoils, to hear himself thus most accurately depicted by the indignant eloquence of the first orator in the world:

"Therefore hath it with all confidence been ordered by the Commons of Great Britain, that I impeach Warren Hastings of high crimes and misdemeanours!

"I impeach him in the name of the Commons House of Parliament, whose trust he has betrayed!

"I impeach him in the name of the English nation, whose ancient honour he has sullied!

"I impeach him in the name of the people of India, whose rights he has trodden under foot, and whose country he has turned into a desert! Lastly, in the name of human nature itself, in the name of both sexes, in the name of every age, in the name of every rank, I impeach the common enemy and oppressor of all!"

Well said Mr. Fox,

"If we are no longer in shameful ignorance of India; if India no longer makes us blush in the eyes of Europe; let us know and feel our obligations to him whose admirable resources of opinion and affection—whose untiring toil, sublime genius, and high aspiring honour, raised him up conspicuous among the most benignant worthies of mankind!"—Speech on the Impeachment of Warren Hastings.

Burke himself calls this great work—the arraignment of Hastings—"that principal act which is to be the glory or the shame of my whole public life."—Works, edit. 1852, ii. 309.

Sheridan's tribute to Burke is worthy of his genius:

"A gentleman whose abilities, happily for the glory of the age in which we live, are not intrusted to the perishable eloquence of the day, but will live to be the admiration of that hour when all of us shall be mute, and most of us forgotten."

The distinguished Schlegel is eloquent in his praise:

"This man has been to his own country and to all Europe—in a very particular manner to Germany—a new light of political wisdom and moral experience. He corrected his age when it was at the height of its revolutionary frenzy; and without maintaining any system of philosophy, he seems to have seen farther into the true nature of society, and to have more clearly comprehended the effect of religion in connecting individual security with national welfare, than any philosopher, or any system of philosophy, of any succeeding age."—Schlegel's Lectures on Literature.

Robert Hall, himself a great master of eloquence, touches a loftier note than is usual even with him, when speaking of Burke:

"Who can withstand the fascination and magic of his eloquence? The excursions of his genius are immense! His imperial fancy has laid all nature under tribute, and has collected riches from every scene of the creation and every walk of art!"

"The immortality of Burke is that which is common to Cicero or to Bacon,—that which can never be interrupted while there exists the beauty of order or the love of virtue, and which can fear no death except what barbarity may impose on the globe."—GRATTAN.

Mr. Grattan may be charged with extravagance in placing Burke upon a par with Cicero and Bacon, but many capable critics are not satisfied with this rank, and assign him a still higher place. Sir James Mackintosh hardly allows to the great master of ancient eloquence, or to the profound father of modern philosophy, an equality with him who combined the excellencies of both:

"Shakspeare and Burke are, if I may venture on the expression, above talent. Burke was one of the first thinkers, as well as one of the greatest orators, of his time. He is without parallel in any age or country, except perhaps Lord Bacon or Cicero; and his works contain an ampler store of political and moral wisdom than can be found in any other writer whatever."

The reader must not fail to procure A Memoir of the Political Life of the Right Hon. Edmund Burke, 2 vols. p. 8vo, by the Rev. George Croly, LL.D., Rector of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook, London.

"We have quoted enough, and more than enough, to convince the most skeptical of the originality, eloquence, and power of these remarkable volumes. We regard them as a valuable contribution to our national literature, as an effectual antidote to revolutionary principles, and as a masterly analysis of the mind and writings of the greatest philosopher and statesman in our history."—The Britannica.

Mr. Warren thus warmly commends the political writings of our great author to the reverence of the student at Law:

"The political writings of the illustrious Edmund Burke need be mentioned, only, to vindicate their claim to the continual perusal—the earnest study, of all who are capable of appreciating the display of profound wisdom, set forth in enchanting eloquence, made contributory to the advancement of the permanent and highest interests of mankind, and capable of indefinitely elevating and expanding the feelings and understanding—but vain is the task of attempting to do justice to writings upon which panegyric has long ago exhausted itself. Out of a thousand witnesses, let us select the testimony of one only—one, however, who has a paramount title to the attention and deference of that Bar, of which he was one of the brightest ornaments—Lord Erskine. 'Among the characteristics of Lord Erskine's eloquence,' observes the late accomplished Mr. Henry Roscoe, 'the perpetual illustrations derived from the writings of Burke, is very remarkable. In every one of the great state trials in which he was concerned, he referred to the works of that extraordinary person, as to a textbook of political wisdom,—expounding, enforcing, and justifying, all the great and noble principles of freedom and justice.' Lord Erskine himself has left on record his impressive testimony to the same effect: 'When I look into my own mind, and find its best lights and principles fed from that immense magazine of moral and political wisdom, which he has left as an inheritance to mankind for their instruction, I feel myself repelled by an awful and grateful sensibility from petulantly approaching him.'—Warren's Law Studies, Lon., 1845, 12mo.

The following testimonies are of equal value:

"The writings of that eminent man whom posterity will regard as the most eloquent of orators, and the most profound of the philosophic statesmen of modern times."—SIR ROBERT PEEL.

"The Speeches he made will be the subject of admiration for all succeeding generations."—LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

"That great master of eloquence, Edmund Burke! . . . In aptitude of comprehension and richness of imagination, superior to every orator, ancient or modern."—T. B. MACAULAY.

"The variety and extent of his powers in debate were greater than that of any orator in ancient or modern times. No one ever poured forth such a flood of thought—so many original combinations of inventive genius; so much knowledge of man, and the workings of political systems; so many just remarks on the relation of government to the manners, the spirit, and even the prejudices, of a people; so many wise maxims as to a change in constitution and laws; so many beautiful effusions of lofty and generous sentiment; such exuberant stores of illustration, ornament, and apt allusion: all intermingled with the liveliest sallies of wit, or the boldest flights of a sublime imagination. . . . In the structure of his mind he had a strong resemblance to Bacon, nor was he greatly his inferior in the leading attributes of his intellect. In imagination he went far beyond him. He united more perfectly than any other man the discordant qualities of the philosopher and the poet."—C. A. GOODRICH, D.D., Professor of Rhetoric in Yale College.

We add an eloquent exposition of the characteristics of Burke's genius from one of the most celebrated orators of our own day:

"No one can doubt that enlightened men in all ages will hang over the Works of MR. BURKE. He was a writer of the first class, and excelled in almost every kind of prose composition. The extraordinary depth of his detached views, the penetrating sagacity which he occasionally applies to the affairs of men and their motives, and the curious felicity of expression with which he unfolds principles, and traces resemblances and relations, are separately the gift of few, and, in their union, probably without any example. When he is handling any one matter, we perceive that we are conversing with a reasoner and a teacher to whom almost every other branch of knowledge is familiar. His views range over all the cognate subjects; his reasonings are derived from principles applicable to other matters as well as the one in hand; arguments pour in from all sides, as well as those which start up under our feet, the natural growth of the path he is leading us over; while, to throw light round our steps, and either explore its darker places or serve for our recreation, illustrations are fetched from a thousand quarters; and an imagination marvellously quick to decry unthought-of resemblances, pours forth the stores which a lore yet more marvellous has gathered from all ages and nations and arts and tongues. We are, in respect of the argument, reminded of Bacon's multifarious knowledge, and the exuberance of his learned fancy; while the many-lettered diction recalls to mind the first of English poets and his immortal verse, rich with the spoils of all sciences and all times.

"All his Works, indeed, even his controversial, are so informed with general reflection, so variegated with speculative discussion, that they wear the air of the Lyceum as well as the Academy. His narrative is excellent; and it is impossible more harmoniously to expose the details of a complicated subject, to give them more animation and interest, if dry in themselves, or to make them bear by the mere power of statement more powerfully upon the argument. In description he can hardly be surpassed, at least for effect; he has all the qualities that conduce to it—ardour of purpose, sometimes rising into violence—vivid, but too luxuriant fancy—bold, frequently extravagant, conception—the faculty of sheddung upon mere inanimate scenery the light imparted by moral associations.

"He now moves on with the composed air, the even, dignified pace of the historian; and unfolds his facts in a narrative so easy, and yet so correct, that you plainly perceive he wanted only the dismissal of other pursuits to have rivalled Livy or Hume. But soon this advance is interrupted, and he stops to display his powers of description, when the boldness of his design is only matched by the brilliancy of his colouring. He then skirmlshes for a space, and puts in motion all the lighter arms of wit; sometimes not unmingled with drollery, sometimes bordering upon farce. His main battery is now opened, and a tempest bursts forth of every weapon of attack—invective, abuse, irony, sarcasm, simile drawn out to allegory, allusion, quotation, fable, parable, anathema.

"He was admirable in exposition; in truth, he delighted to give instruction both when speaking and conversing, and in this he was unrivalled. Quis in sententiis arguitur? in docendo ediscendoneque subtilior? Mr. Fox might well avow, without a compliment, that he had learnt more from him than from all other men and authors."—LORD BROGHAM.

It is truly gratifying to know that there are no incongruous colours in the background to detract from the brilliancy and beauty of the portrait we have thus presented of Edmund Burke: "the King's daughter was all glorious within," and so with the illustrious subject of our theme;—we are not called upon to deplore the union of splendid talents and degrading vices, of public philanthropy and private venality: the spotless ermine covers no hidden corruption. Of this we have abundant evidence:

"The unspotted innocence, the firm integrity of Burke," says Dr. Parr, "want no embellishing, and if he is accustomed to exact a rigorous account of the moral conduct of others, it is justified in one who shuns not the most inquisitorial scrutiny into his own."

The Rev. Mr. Crabbe, whom Burke raised from a position of want and distress to competency and comfort, speaks in glowing terms

"Of his private worth, of his wishes to do good, of his affability and condescension; his readiness to lend assistance where he knew it was wanted; his delight to give praise where he thought it was deserved; his affectionate manners, his amiable disposition, and seal for their happiness which he manifested in the hours of retirement with the members of his family."

"A much higher feature of his character than wit, was a fervent and unforgotten spirit of piety, cheerful but humble, unallied to any thing like fanaticism, and expressive of a deep dependence on the dispensations of Providence, traces of which are to be found in the letters of his boyhood. . . . His moral character stood wholly unimpeached by any thing that approached to the name of vice."—PRIOR.

Of the affecting incidents of "the inevitable hour" which comes alike to all, the great and the obscure, the learned and the untaught, the man who feareth God and the man who feareth him not,—we have a graphic sketch by the friend of his bosom—Dr. French Laurence. The poet truly tells us,

"The chamber where the good man meets his fate
Is privileged beyond the common walks of life," and we are assured upon higher authority, "that it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting; for that is the end of all men, and the living will lay it to heart." Let us then in spirit contemplate to our profit the last earthly scene of the philosopher, the patriot, and the Christian:

"His end was suited to the simple greatness of mind which he displayed through life, every way unaffected, without levity, without ostentation, full of natural grace and dignity; he appeared neither to wish nor to dread, but patiently and placidly to await, the hour of his dissolution. He had been listening to some essays of Addison's, in which he ever took delight; he had recommended himself, in many affectionate messages, to the remembrance of those absent friends whom he had never ceased to love; he had conversed some time with his accustomed force of thought and expression on the awful situation of his country, for the welfare of which his heart was interested to the very last beat; he had given with steady composure some private directions, in contemplation of his approaching death; when, as his attendants were conveying him to his bed, he sunk down, and, after a short struggle, passed quietly and without a groan to eternal rest, in that mercy which he had just declared he had long sought with unfeigned humiliation, and to which he looked with a trembling hope!"

In conformity with the directions of his will, he was buried in the church at Beaconsfield, in the same grave with his son and brother.

Viewed in the light of the present age, how great is our admiration of that foresight which foretold, and that wisdom which would have averted, the storms which menaced the peace and well-being of his country! Impartial in his judgment, unswayed by every wind of political doctrine, because based upon the rock of truth, he as zealously denounced that arbitrary power which oppressed the American Colonies, as he rebuked that hurricane of fierce democracy which swept the throne and the altar from France, and involved the Court and the Commonalty in a general ruin. Had his counsel been followed, Warren Hastings would have expiated his crimes on the scaffold, and the world would have lacked a Napoleon to illustrate the depravity of his race. Burke's public labours present a continuous struggle against the stupidity, the obstinacy, and the venality, of the politicians of his day. His life, therefore, cannot be said to have been a happy one, for happiness dwells not amidst ceaseless vexations; and no man can "possess his soul in peace" whose philanthropy stimulates him to the duty of enlightening the ignorant, reforming the vicious, and subduing the refractory. He does well; he acts nobly; he fulfils the end of his being; and if he have the spiritual prerequisites, many will be his consolations here, and great shall be his reward hereafter. But let him not expect much either of gratitude or applause in this life: malice will censure, envy defame, rivalry decry, the noblest motives and the wisest acts. Yet posterity will do him justice; and generations yet unborn shall reverence his name, emulate his virtues, and follow in his steps. His "good name shall be an inheritance to his children's children," and the "remembrance of the just shall be blessed!"

Behold an instance of this noble advocacy of right, and its appreciation by an admiring posterity, in the philanthropic labours of Edmund Burke, and the deep reverence with which his character is regarded in the present day!

In the three principal questions which excited his interest, and called forth the most splendid displays of his eloquence—the contest with the American Colonies, the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and the French Revolution—we see displayed a philanthropy the most pure, illustrated by a genius the most resplendent. In each of these cases he was the friend of the oppressed, the rebuker of the insolence of power, the excesses of petty tyranny, or the fierce ragings of a successful and unprincipled democracy. He was ever the bold and uncompromising champion of justice, mercy, and truth. When his own sovereign stretched forth the hand of despotic power to afflict a suffering nation, he forgot that "the king could do no wrong," and pointed his finger to a violated constitution and broken laws! When a remorseless Verres ground to the earth, by his exactions and cruelty, a simple and confiding people whose rights and happiness he should have maintained and cherished, their cries entered into the heart even of the oppressor's nation, and a greater than Cicero cited the offender to that nation's bar! When the pestilential fever of an insane democracy broke out in France, and threatened to devour the nations, the High Priest of enlightened Liberty "stood between the living and the dead, and the plague was stayed!"

So long as virtue shall be beloved, wisdom revered, or genius admired, so long will the memory of this illustrious exemplar of all be fresh in the world's history; for human nature has too much interest in the preservation of such a character, ever to permit the name of EDMUND BURKE to perish from the earth.

Burnet, Elizabeth, 1661-1709, third wife of Bishop Burnet, was a daughter of Sir Richard Blake, Knt. At 18 she married Robert Berkeley, Esq., who died in 1693. In 1700 she was united to Bishop Burnet, who had lost his second wife two years previously. A Method for Devotion, or Rules for Holy and Devout Living; 2d edit., Lon., 1709, 8vo; 3d edit., 1715, 8vo. See Lowndes's Bibl. Man.

Burnet, Gilbert, 1643-1715, a native of Edinburgh, was sent at the age of ten to the University of Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. before he was 14. At 18 he was received as a probationer, and in 1665 was ordained priest in the Episcopal Church, and presented to the living of Saltoun. Two years previously he had visited Holland, and applied himself to the study of Hebrew under a learned Jew. In 1669 he became Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow; Chaplain to the King, preacher at the Rolls, and lecturer of St. Clement's, London, 1674, '05. In 1663 he attended Lord Russell to the scaffold, and being suspected of disaffection, thought it prudent to retire to Paris. It is to be recorded to his honour, that although offered the Bishopric of Chichester, by Charles II., if he would embrace his cause, he refused the overture, and wrote him a faithful letter, exhorting him to reform his licentious life and impolitic measures.

"I told the king, I hoped the reflection on what had befallen his father on the 30th of January, might move him to consider these things more carefully."

He returned to England in 1685, but again fled to Paris on the accession of James II. in the same year. He travelled for some time on the Continent, after which, at the invitation of the Prince and Princess of Orange—daughter and son-in-law to James II.—he took up his residence at the Hague, and bore so prominent a share in the political counsels of the court, that James II.

"Ordered a prosecution of High Treason to be commenced against him, and demanded his person from the States-general, but without effect, as he had previously acquired the rights of naturalization, by forming a union—his first wife being dead—with a Dutch lady of large fortune named Scott."

The influence of Burnet in bringing about the Revolution of 1688, and the accession of William and Mary, was perhaps greater than that of any other person. He accompanied William to England as his chaplain, and took an active part in the settlement of the new government. In 1689 the king offered him the Bishopric of Salisbury, but with his usual disinterestedness he begged him to confer it on his old friend Dr. Lloyd. His majesty replied, "I have another person in view," and next day nominated Burnet to the see, to which was added subsequently the Chancellorship of the Order of the Garter. The new bishop now zealously occupied himself with his literary and official duties, leading a most industrious and useful life until the year 1715, when he was attacked with a pleuritic fever, which proved fatal on the 17th of March. The bishop was a very voluminous writer: see list in Watt's Bib. Brit., and Lowndes's Bibl. Manual. We notice a few of his principal works: Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, Lon., 1677, fol.; last edit., Oxf., 1852, 8vo. History of the Reformation of the Church of England, vol. i. 1679, fol. This publication was rewarded with an honour never conferred before or since upon an author. He received the thanks of Parliament, with a request that he would continue his researches, and complete the work he had so well commenced. The historian acquiesced: in 1681 he pub. vol. ii., and in 1715 vol. iii., with supplement.

"His History of the Reformation had been received with loud applause by all parties, and had been felt by the Roman Catholics as a severe blow. The greatest Doctor that the Church of Rome has produced since the schism of the 16th century, Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, was engaged in framing an elaborate reply."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of England.

"In Bishop Burnet's History of the Church of England, you will have a full view of the steps which our church took when she reformed herself from the errors of Popery."—Dr. WORTON.

SAYES: Lectures on Mod. History.

"One of the most thoroughly digested books of the century."—PROF. SPALDING.

This work was speedily translated into several European languages. In the continuation, Burnet had the valuable assistance of Bishops Lloyd, Tillotson, and Stillingfleet. The notes and preface of Dr. Nares in his edit. are valuable, and Mr. G. L. Corrie's Abridgment (Oxf., 1847, 8vo) will answer a useful purpose. An edit. was pub. in 1829, Oxf., 7 vols. 8vo; and in 1850, Lon., 2 vols. imp. 8vo, illustrated with 44 portraits from Lodge, and by many valuable notes. Before reading Burnet, Lenfant's History of the Council of Constance, 1728, 2 vols. 4to, should be perused. This is Burnet's own advice:

"I cannot recommend too highly Lenfant's History of the Council of Constance, in which the author has, with great care, given a view of the state of the Church and Religion before the Reformation, and should be read to prepare a man for reading 'my history.'"—Pref. to Hist. Reform.

Gibbon thus notices Lenfant:

"The Histories of the three successive Councils, Pisa, Constance, and Basel, have been written with a tolerable degree of candour, industry, and elegance, by a Protestant minister, M. Lenfant, who retired from France to Berlin."

Burnet's work did not meet with universal commendation: M. Le Grand, Varillas, and others in France, Lowth, Wharton, and Hickes at home, opened their batteries upon the stout prelate, who was but little disconcerted by such assaults. Wharton allows it to have a reputation firmly and deservedly established. Many errors which had crept into preceding narrations were corrected by Burnet.

"The defects of Peter Heylyn's History of the Reformation are abundantly supplied in our author's more complete history. He gives a practical account of all the affairs of the Reformation, from its beginning in the reign of Henry VIII. to its final establishment under Queen Elizabeth, A.D. 1559. And the whole is penned in a masculine style, such as becomes an historian, and is the property of this author in all his writings. The collection of records which he gives at the end of each volume, are good vouchers of the truth of what he delivers in the body of the history, and are much more perfect than could reasonably be expected, after the pains taken in Queen Mary's days to suppress every thing that carried the marks of the Reformation upon it." See Bishop Nicolson's Eng. Hist. Library.

The bishop increased his celebrity by the Lives of Rochester, 1680, 8vo, Hale, and Queen Mary, (including Rochester,) 1682, 2 vols. 8vo, and Bishop Bedell, 1685, 8vo. He pub. some other valuable biographical sketches, and the reader is referred to his Lives and Characters, including Hale, Rochester, Boyle, Leighton, &c., edited, with an introduction, by Bishop Jebb, Lon., 1833, 8vo. This vol. also contains Five Unpublished Letters, by Anne, Countess Dowager of Rochester, and Burnet's Address to Posterity.

"Bishop Burnet's short but exquisite Address to Posterity will be read and re-read, with fresh improvement and delight, as long as the English language lasts.

The interesting incidents connected with the Conversion of the Earl of Rochester, through the instrumentality of Burnet, are well known.

"The life of Rochester is a work which the critic ought to read for its elegance, the philosopher for its arguments, and the saint for its piety."—DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

In 1683 he pub. a trans. from the original Latin (1551) of Sir Thomas More's Utopia. In 1692, 4to, appeared his celebrated Discourse of the Pastoral Care, which is considered by some the best of his writings. The 3d edit., 1713, has a valuable preface added: an edit. was pub. in 1821, 12mo. An enlarged edit. of his History of the Reign of King James the Second was pub. at Oxf., 1852, 8vo. His Exposition of the XXXIX. Articles of the Church of England appeared in 1699, fol. Of this work there have been numerous editions.

"The good bishop seems to be so attentive to the various and contradictory opinions of others in the several Articles, that you are often at a loss to find his own."—DR. WILLIAMS.

"The work contains much information, and candour: perhaps pursued to a blamable excess."—Biographer's Christian Student. And see chap. xi. in that work.

The Exposition of the Articles is highly commended by Archbishops Tillotson, Tenison, and Sharp; Bishops Stillingfleet, Patrick, Lloyd, Hall, Williams, and other authorities. The Rev. J. R. Pate has pub. an edit., with a valuable Appendix, Notes, and Additional References, Lon., 1843, 8vo.

"The editor has given to our clergy and our students in theology an edition of this work, which must necessarily supersede every other; and we feel he deserves well at the hands of the church which he has so materially served."—Church of England Quarterly Review.

"The valuable references, notes, and indices, which accompany this edition, give it a vast superiority over every other."—BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.

"Though Burnet's work may have peculiar attractions to an Episcopalian as an exposition of his articles of faith, yet as a treasury of Biblical and theological knowledge, it is alike valuable to Christians of every communion."—Lon. Christian Observer.

"One of the celebrated History of his Own Times was left in MS. at his death, with orders that it should not be pub. until six years after, when it was given to the world without alteration. The first volume, however, did not appear until 1724, and the 2d was delayed until 1734. The work was pub. by his son Thomas. This interesting work has been much abused by the Tories, and it has been a convenient target for the wits of such critics as Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, and others. The last attempted a parody under the title of Memoirs of P. P., Clerk of this Parish. Dr. Flexman pub. an edit. of the Bishop's Own Times, with Notes, &c., in 1753, 6 vols. 8vo. An edit. was pub. at Oxford, 1835, 6 vols. 8vo, and the last edit. appeared in 1847, Lon., 2 vols. imp. 8vo, with Hist. and Biog. Notes, and 51 portraits. Such men as the wits just named can bring any writer into ridicule, but to impugn literary integrity is a more difficult matter. We may venture something, but we are willing to incur the risk, when we avow the opinion that Burnet is one of the most veracious chroniclers in the language. It was the freedom of its strictures upon certain pet characters that excited the satire of Pope and the ridicule of Arbuthnot. As for the terms "Silly Puppy," "Scotch Dog," "Canting Puppy," and such other elegancies of the kennel, of which Swift was so accomplished a master, we doubt if they disturb the manes of the worthy prelate. It is an everyday thing to find a writer of some centuries' standing accused of prejudice, misrepresentation, misconception, &c.; but how a critic, who lives two or three hundred years after a certain occurrence has transpired, can understand it so much better than an eye or ear-witness, we are too dull to discern. Dr. Johnson's opinion, as recorded by Boswell, will serve as an instance—though much less condemnatory than many—of what we refer to:

"Burnet's History of his Own Times is very entertaining. The style, indeed, is mere chit-chat. I do not believe that Burnet intentionally lied; but he was so much prejudiced, that he took no pains to find out the truth. He was like a man who resolves to regulate his time by a certain watch; but will not inquire whether the watch is right or not."

One might suppose that the doctor had roomed with the bishop, at least: he seems to be so perfectly informed as to his habits.

Professor Smyth is disposed to do our author more justice than he has generally had accorded to him:

"Whatever he reports himself to have heard or seen, the reader may be assured he really did hear or see. But we must receive his representations and conclusions with that caution which must ever be observed when we listen to the relation of a warm and busy partisan, whatever be his natural integrity and good sense. He is often censured, and sometimes corrected; but the fact seems to be, that, without his original, and certainly honest, account, we should know little about the wants and affairs he professes to explain. Many of the writers who are not very willing to receive his assistance, would be totally at a loss without it."—Lect. on Modern History.

We are glad to see that our (for, although American-born, we claim all the meritorious English authors as ours) latest historical commentator, Mr. Macaulay, defends the bishop against his accusers:

"It is usual to censure Burnet as a singularly inaccurate historian, but I believe the charge to be altogether unjust. He appears to be singularly inaccurate only because his narrative has been subjected to a scrutiny singularly severe and unfriendly. If any Whig thought it worth while to subject Rescaby's Memoirs, North's Examen, Mulgrave's Account of the Revolution, or the Life of James the Second, edited by Clarke, to a similar scrutiny, it would soon appear that Burnet was indeed far from being the most inexact writer of his time."—Hist. of England.

Horace Walpole considers that the bishop's credulity, as he styles it, is a proof of his honesty, and pays a deserved compliment to the easy flow of his narrative:

"It seems as if he had just come from the King's closet, or from the apartment of the man whom he describes, and was telling his reader, in plain terms, what he had seen and heard."

Charles Lamb bears testimony to the same effect:

"I am reading Burnet's Own Times. Did you ever read that garrulous, pleasant history? full of scandal, which all true history is;—no palliatives, but all the stark wickedness that actually gives the momentum to national actors:—none of that cured Hemlock indifference—so cold, and unnatural, and inhuman." &c.—Letters.

As an extempore preacher the bishop was so happy, that his congregation dreaded his "finally" as much as his severest official reprehension. Sir John Jekyl told Speaker Onslow, that one day when he was present, and the worthy prelate had "preached out the hour-glass" before he had finished his subject, "he took it up, and held it aloft in his hand, and then turned it up for another hour; upon which the audience—a very large one for the place—set up almost a shout for joy.”

We mean no irreverence to the clergy when we remark that one “hour-glass” is as much as a modern congregation consider themselves entitled to claim.

As a parish priest, as well as a diocesan, Burnet was most exemplary. He wrote well upon the Pastoral Care, but he did better,—he was the constant exemplar of his own precepts. We give a specimen of his “manner of life:—”

“During the five years he remained at Saltoun, he preached twice every Sunday, and once on one of the week-days: he catechized three times a week, so as to examine every parishioner, old or young, three times in the course of a year: he went round the parish from house to house, instructing, reproving, or comforting them, as occasion required: the sick he visited twice a day: he personally instructed all such as gave notice of their intention to receive the communion.”—Life, by his son, Thomas Burnet, in Hist. Own Times.

His indifference for preferment, “his degrading himself into the lowest and most painful duties of his calling,” that he might go about doing good, are highly extolled by a competent witness, the Marquis of Halifax. In truth, both the Church and the State are under such deep obligations to the exertions of Bishop Burnet, as a clergyman and as a statesman, that it ill becomes Englishmen to treat his memory with either injustice or indifference. See Biog. Brit.; Swift's Works; Granger's Letters; Laing's Hist. of Scotland; Birch's Tillotson; Burnet's Reform., 1850; Own Times, 1847.

Burnet, Gilbert, the bishop's second son, educated at Merton College, Oxford, and at Leyden, was chaplain to George I.: he died early in life. An Abridgt. of vol. iii. of his father's Hist. of the Reformation, 1719. The Generation of the Son of God, 1720, 8vo. He espoused the cause of Hoadly in the Bangorian controversy, and wrote three pieces on the occasion, 1718, &c. He was a contributor to the Free-thinker, (collected in 3 vols. 12mo,) and perhaps to Hibernicus's Letters, 1725, '26, '27.

Burnet, Gilbert, d. 1746, aged 48, Vicar of Coggeshall, Essex, and Minister of St. James's, Clerkenwell, abridged the 3 fol. vols. of the Boyle Lectures in 4 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1737. Practical Sermons, Lon., 1747, 2 vols. 8vo.

“His sermons are written in an agreeable, instructive, and practical manner; displaying solid reasoning, true piety, and unaffected charity.”

Burnet, Jacob, an American. Notes on the Early Settlement of the North Western Territory, 8vo.

“To all who feel an interest in the destinies of the Western Country, this book supplies the elements from which a correct judgment may be formed, not only of its past history, but also of its probable position, in an intellectual and moral point of view. For it is only by considering what a nation has been, that any correct idea can be gained concerning what it is likely to be.”

Burnet, James, Lord Monboddo, 1714–1799, a native of Kincardineshire, Scotland, was educated at King's College, Aberdeen, and studied Civil Law at Groningen, Holland. He was distinguished rather for profound than useful learning. In 1764 he was appointed Sheriff of Kincardineshire, and in 1767 he succeeded Lord Milton as a Lord of Session. The Origin and Progress of Language, Edin., 1773, 6 vols. 8vo. His lordship was as much enamoured of the ancients—especially the Greeks—as ever was the Doctor in Peregrine Pickle. The above-named work was intended to settle the question as to the superiority of his favourite ancients over a degenerate posterity. It was not successful.

“Nothing, it was said, but the strange absurdity of his opinions, could have hindered his book from falling dead-born from the press.”

Dr. Johnson often ridiculed the peculiar notions entertained by Monboddo; though, by-the-by, there were some points of similarity between them, for Foote calls “Monboddo an Elzevir edition of Johnson.” When the author of Rasselas paid the modern Greek a visit, the latter pointed to the Douglas Arms in his house;—“In such houses,” said he, “our ancestors lived, who were better men than we.” “No, no, my lord,” said Johnson: “we are as strong as they, and a great deal wiser.” Monboddo was an advocate of the superiority of the savage state: he considered that men were originally monkeys, and that a nation still existed with tails.

“Dr. Johnson attacked Lord Monboddo's strange speculation on the primitive state of human nature. ‘Sir, it is all conjecture about a thing useless, even were it known to be true. Knowledge of all kinds is good. Conjecture, as to things useful, is good; but conjecture as to what would be useless to know, such as whether men went upon all fours, is very idle. . . . It is a pity to see Lord Monboddo publish such notions as he has done; a man of sense, and of so much elegant learning. There would be little in a fool doing it; we should only laugh: but when a wise man does it, we are sorry.’ [Monboddo had written a preface to the trans. of Condorcet's Account of the Savage Girl.] Other people have strange notions; but they conceal them. If they have tails [alluding to Monboddo's theory of the originally tailed-state of man] they hide them: but Monboddo is as jealous of his tail as a squirrel.”—Boswell's Johnson.

“When Sir Joseph Banks returned from Botany Bay, Monboddo inquired after the long-tailed men, and, according to Johnson, was not pleased that they had not been found in all his peregrinations.”

The Origin and Progress of Language was intended to vindicate the honour of Grecian literature: to properly set forth the excellencies of the Grecian philosophy, he pub. his Ancient Metaphysics, or the Science of Universals, with an Examination of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy, Edin., 1779–99, 6 vols. 4to.

“This work evinces, like the other, his extravagant fondness for Grecian learning and philosophy, and his scorn for all that was modern. It proves, that, though versed in the science of Aristotle and Plato, he knew not, for want of a sufficient acquaintance with modern literature, how to explain that science to his contemporaries.”

We think that there is great weight in Bacon's remark that the early age of the world cannot properly be called its antiquity. The latter ages are really the antiquity of the world. The remark will be found somewhere in the Advancement of Learning.

Burnet, John, b. 1784, at Fisherrow, near Edinburgh, a distinguished engraver and writer on Art. Practical Treatise on Painting, 1822–27, 4to: pub. orig. in three parts. *Hints on Composition, Light and Shade, and Colour. Burnet, Thomas, 1635–1715, a native of Croft, Yorkshire, entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, 1651; removed to Christ's College, 1654; Fellow, 1657; Master of the Charter-house, by the Duke of Ormond's influence, 1685. He gained great distinction by the following work: Telluris theoria sacra: orbis nostri originem et mutationes generales quas aut jam eubuit, aut olim subituras est, complectens. Libri duo priores de Diluvio et Paradiso, Lon., 1681, 4to. Libri duo posteriores, de conflagratione mundi et de futuro rerum statu, 1689, 4to, that is,—the English reader will understand—the first two books treat of the Deluge and Paradise; the last two, of the burning of the World and the New Heavens and New Earth. This work met with much applause, and even Charles II. forgot his dogs and ladies long enough to give it an inspection, which amply rewarded his pains. The author was thus encouraged to translate it into English. He pub. the first two books—The Sacred Theory of the Earth, &c.—in 1684, fol., with a dedication to Charles II., and the last in 1689, with a dedication to Queen Mary. The English version is by no means an exact transcript of the original; there are additions, abridgments, and alterations. The references to patristic literature are much fuller in the Latin than in the English. As regards ingenuity of hypothesis and majesty of style, the work is beyond praise; as a philosophical system, it is beneath criticism. Geological data, and the first principles of scriptural exegesis, are entirely neglected by our fanciful theorist. Addison complimented the author in a Latin ode, (in 1689), which has been prefixed to some editions of the commended work, in which he addresses him in the most flattering terms:

“O pectus ingens! O animum gravem,
Mundi capax! Si bonos auguror,
Te, nostra quo tellus superbit,
Accipit renovata civem.”

Dr. Warton ranks Burnet with the few in whom the three great faculties of the understanding, viz.: judgment, imagination, and memory have been found united; and he considers him to have displayed an imagination very nearly equal to that of Milton. On the other hand, Warren, Keill, Croft, and Whiston attacked his errors; and Flamstead is reputed to have told the author that “there went more to the making of a world than a fine-turned period, and that he was able to overthrow the theory in one sheet of paper.” There are certainly grave errors put forth by Burnet, which we need not specify here. The literary excellence of the Theory has been acknowledged even by those who most strongly condemned its assumptions. Keill tells us

"For as I believe never was any book fuller of errors and mistakes in philosophy, so none ever abounded with more beautiful scenes and surprising images of nature. But I write only to those who might perhaps expect to find a true philosophy in it; they who read it as ingenious romance will still be pleased with their entertainment."

But Keill treats the author with much severity in other parts of his Examination.

"Apart from his mistakes, his works contain some things relating to the Scriptures worth reading: while the reader ought to be on his guard against their sophistry and skepticism."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

In 1727, 12 years after his death, appeared De Fide et Officiis Christianorum, and De Statu Mortuorum et Resurgentiæ, the last advocating the doctrine of the Millennium, and the limited duration of Future Punishment. Burnet had a few copies privately printed, but had no intention of publishing a work which he knew would elicit much censure. Imperfect copies, however, got into circulation, and Burnet's friend Wilkinson determined to publish a correct edition. In a 2d edit., pub. in 1733, an addition was made to the last-named piece, entitled De futura Judæorum restauratione, taken from Burnet's MSS. He is also said to have been the author of three pieces pub. without his name under the title of Remarks upon an Essay concerning Human Understanding; the first two pub. in 1697, the last in 1699, which Remarks met with a response by Mrs. Catherine Trotter (afterwards Cockburn) in her Defence of Locke's Essay, 1702, written when Mrs. Trotter was but twenty-three years of age. It is to be regretted that Burnet's judgment was so much inferior to his imagination. His Sacred Theory of the Earth is "A splendid example of erroneous views in philosophy."—Edinburgh Review.

"Some of the author's peculiarities have tended to discredit other scriptural doctrines which he supported."—BICKERSTETH.

"His sentiments are far from orthodox on many points. He considered the Mosiac account of the Fall, a pious allegory; original sin, a fiction; and he doubted the resurrection of the same body, and the eternity of future punishment."—OSWALD.

His works are now much neglected, although when first published

"The novelty of his ideas, the perspicuity and elegance of his style, recommended his works to the attention of the learned."—Baile's Philosophy.

This is a very curious dissertation.

Burnet, Thomas, d. 1753, nephew of the above, and third and youngest son of Bishop Burnet, was educated at Merton College, after leaving which he became a student of the Temple. The abstruse mysteries of Law pleased him less than "good company," and he was in a fair way to be ruined when he took a determination to change his course. His father, one day, observing his unusually grave countenance, asked him what he was meditating? "A greater work," replied the son, "than your lordship's History of the Reformation." "What is that, Tom?" "My own reformation, my lord." "I shall be heartily glad to see it," responded the father, "but almost despair of it." Now we may pardon the bishop's incredulity, when we are informed that the scapegrace was suspected of being one of the wild "Mohocks" of whom we read so much in the Spectator. Swift tells Stella,

"Young Davenant tells us how he was set upon by the Mohocks, and how they ran his chair through with a sword. It is not safe being in the streets at night. The Bishop of Salisbury's son is said to be of the gang. They are all Whigs."

Yet the young man was better even than his word, he not only thought of reforming—he reformed, and became one of the most prominent lawyers of his day, and in 1741 was made a Justice of the Court of Common Pleas. We have already referred to his having published his father's History of his Own Times, and he gave to the world some political pamphlets,—A Letter to the People, Our Ancestors as wise as we, &c.—and a vol. of his poems was pub. in 1777. He incurred the displeasure of Pope by a travesty of the first book of the Iliad. Of course, he was pub. in the Dunciad, which pillory would always hold one more offender.

Burnet, William, 1688–1729, eldest son of Bishop Burnet, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Leyden. He was one of the many dupes of the South Sea scheme. In 1720 he was appointed Governor of New York, and was transferred to the government of Massachusetts and New Hampshire in 1728. He contributed to Phil. Trans., and pub. an Essay on Scripture Prophecy, 1724.

"He attempted to explain the three periods contained in the twelfth chapter of Daniel, with arguments to prove that the first period expired in 1715."

"The ingenuousness of the author secures to him the confidence of his readers, while the fairness of his narrative, the flow of his style, and the liberality and good sense which distinguish his remarks, render the perusal of his work highly gratifying. We render this little volume very moderate justice when we state that it exceeds in interest and value many larger works penned under circumstances more auspicious."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Burnett, Gilbert T., 1800–1835, a lineal descendant of Bishop Burnet, (he added a t to the patronymic,) was Professor of Botany in King's College, London, to the Royal Institution, the Company of Apothecaries, and to the Medico-Botanical Society. He was also a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, associate editor of the London Medical and Surgical Journal, editor of Dr. Stephenson and Mr. Churchill's Medical Botany, 3 vols. 8vo, a contributor to several medical journals, and pub. Outlines of Botany, 1835, 8vo. His sister, Miss M. A. Burnett, has published from his MSS., Illustrations of Useful Plants employed in the Arts and Medicine, 126 Nos. 1842–49, 4to. "Burnett's Criminal Law is admitted to be, in many points of view, imperfect and unsatisfactory; but it is remarkable as having been one of the earliest serious attempts to form a collection of decisions. Though he is looked at by the Bench with some distrust, yet his excellences are manifold, and are more seldom quoted than his errors, because the former have now become part of our consuetudinary practice."—Law Journal.

the United States. Accordingly the volume was pub. in 1786, 8vo, at Kilmarnock, and met with great success, the 600 copies resulting in a profit of £20, which was a small fortune to the young author. Burns now engaged his passage, embraced his friends, and sent his chest to Greenock to be placed on board a vessel bound for Jamaica, when he received through a letter to a friend, an invitation from Dr. Blacklock to visit Edinburgh. It was accepted, for—remarks Burns—

"His opinion that I would meet with encouragement in Edinburgh for a second edition of my poems fired me so much, that away I posted for that city, without a single acquaintance, or a single letter of introduction."

He was greatly admired in Edinburgh: Dr. Robertson, Dugald Stewart, Henry Mackenzie, and other men of note, felt a pleasure in drawing admiring crowds round the rustic poet, whose conversational abilities struck his auditors with as much surprise as they had experienced from the perusal of his verses.

"It needs no effort of imagination to conceive what the sensations of an isolated set of scholars (almost all either clergymen or professors) must have been in the presence of this big-boned, black-browed, brawny stranger, with his great flashing eyes, who having forced his way among them from the plough-tail, at a single stride, manifested in the whole strain of his bearing and conversation, a most thorough conviction that in the society of the most eminent men of his nation, he was exactly where he was entitled to be: hardly deigned to flatter them by exhibiting even an occasional symptom of being flattered by their notice: by turns calmly measured himself against the most cultivated understandings of his time, in discussion; overpowered the bon mots of the most celebrated convivialists by broad flows of merriment, impregnated with all the burning life of genius; astounded bosoms habitually enveloped in the three-piled folds of social reserve, by compelling them to tremble—nay to tremble visibly—beneath the fearless touch of natural pathos."—LOCKHART.

The Bishop of Aberdeen, whom Burns visited when in that city not long after, gives us a high opinion of the poet's power of interesting his new friends:

"As to his personal appearance, it is very much in his favour. He is a genteel-looking young man, of good address, and talks with as much propriety as if he had received an academical education. He has, indeed, a flow of language, and seems never at a loss to express himself in the strongest and most nervous manner. On my quoting with surprise, some sentiments of the Ayrshire plowman, 'Well,' said he, 'and a plowman I was from my youth, and till within these two years had my shoes studded with a hundred tackets. But even then I was a reader, and had very early made all the English poets familiar to me, not forgetting the old bards of the best of all the poetical books, the Old Testament.'"—Bishop Skinner's Letter to his son.

A second edition of his poems was pub. at Edinburgh in 1787, 2 vols. 8vo; the immediate profit of which, including copyright and subscriptions, was £700, and a further sum was subsequently received by the successful author. This large receipt in a day of comparatively few readers, is to be attributed to the fact that many subscribers voluntarily paid one and two guineas per copy, instead of the six shillings required. The 2800 copies were subscribed for by 1500 individuals. At Edinburgh Burns unfortunately acquired those habits of intemperance and association with the profligate which proved his bane. He returned in 1788 to Ayrshire, appropriated £200 of his fortune to the relief of his aged mother and his brother, and married Jean Armour, (his "Bonny Jean,") an old acquaintance, the daughter of a mason in Mauchlin. His first love, "Highland Mary," (Mary Campbell,) fell a victim to a malignant fever when making preparations for her marriage to our poet. He commemorated her in his touching elegy "To Mary in Heaven," in language which will outlast the sculptured marble and storied urn of the noble's tomb. By means of the mistaken friendship of Dr. Wood, Burns was appointed an exciseman or gauger, (worth £70 per annum,) which threw into the way of temptation an appetite already solicited the excitement of the intoxicating bowl. A benevolent gentleman, Mr. Peter Millar, leased him the farm of Ellisland, on the banks of the Nith, in Dumfriesshire, on very advantageous terms, and he had every encouragement to lead a virtuous life, relieving agricultural toil by converse with the muse; but intemperance had now become a confirmed habit, and rendered him an easy prey to a fever which carried him off at the early age of thirty-seven years and six months. He had removed to the town of Dumfries in 1791. In 1792 he contributed to A Select Collection of original Scottish Airs for the Voice, all the songs which form vol. 3d of the edit. of his works in 3 vols. 12mo. He pub. a third edit. of his poems at Dumfries in 1793. He also contributed to, we may almost say edited, Mr. James Johnson's Scots' Musical Museum, pub. in 6 vols., 1787-1803; in 1839 a new edit., with Notes and Illustrations, was pub. An ed. of Burns's works was pub. in 1798, 2 vols. 8vo. Works, with Life and Criticisms, &c., by James Currie, Liverp., 1800, 4 vols. 8vo; several edita. Reliques, Letters, &c., by

Up to the present year (1858) perhaps 115 edita. have been issued in all! The illustrated edition by Blackie & Son, Edin., 2 vols. r. 8vo, preceded by Prof. Wilson's Essay on the Genius and Character of Burns, and Dr. Currie's Memoir of the Poet, with Notes and Literary and Pictorial Illustrations, has met with great favour.

Allan Cunningham's edition, (pub. by Henry G. Bohn,) with Life by A. C., and Notes by Sir Walter Scott, Thomas Campbell, Wordsworth, and Lockhart, 1847, contains 150 pieces more than are to be found in Currie's edition. Mr. Bohn's edit. contains 848 pages, whereas one pub. in similar shape professing to be "the only complete edition," contains but 504 pages, the matter being two-thirds only of Bohn's edit. In the latter the life by Cunningham fills 164 pp.; whilst in the former it is abridged and comprised in 47 pages. It is an interesting fact that within a year from the publication of Burns's Poems in Edinburgh, 1787, two editions were pub. in the United States, viz.: in New York and in Philadelphia, 1788.

The melancholy story of Burns adds another to the dark catalogue of the victims of the arch-demon INTemperance. When will men learn to shun all companionship with that fell enemy which "steals away the brains," destroys the peace, and blasts the reputation, and effectually ruins the bodies and souls of its votaries?

We conclude with some brief extracts from opinions on this distinguished son of song:

"Burns is by far the greatest poet that ever sprung from the bosom of the people and lived and died in a humble condition. Indeed, no country in the world but Scotland could have produced such a man; and he will be forever regarded as the glorious representative of the genius of his country. He was born a poet, if ever man was, and to his native genius alone is owing the perpetuity of his fame. For he manifestly had never deeply studied poetry as an art, nor reasoned much about its principles, nor looked abroad into the wide ken of intellect for objects and subjects on which to pour out his inspiration. . . . The strings of his lyre sometimes yield their finest music to the sighs of remorse or repentance. Whatever, therefore, be the faults or defects of the poetry of Burns—and no doubt it has many—it has, beyond all that was ever written, this greatest of all merits, intense, life-pervading, and life-breathing truth."—Prof. Wilson's Essay on the Genius and Character of Burns.

"All that remains of Burns, the writings he has left, seem to us no more than a poor mutilated fraction of what was in him: brief, broken glimpses of a genius that could never show itself complete; that wanted all things for completeness: culture, leisure, true effort, nay, even length of life. His poems are, with scarcely any exception, mere occasional effusions, poured forth with little premeditation, expressing, by such means as offered, the passion, opinion, or humour of the hour. Never in one instance was it permitted to grapple with any subject with the full collection of his strength, to fuse and mould it in the concentrated fire of his genius. To try by the strict rules of art such imperfect fragments, would be at once unprofitable and unfair. Nevertheless, there is something in these poems, marred and defective as they are, which forbids the most fastidious student of poetry to pass them by. . . . The excellence of Burns is, indeed, among the rarest, whether in poetry or prose; but, at the same time, it is plain, and easily recognised—his indisputable air of truth."—THOMAS CARLILE: Edin. Review, xlviii. 273.

"The rank of Burns is the very first of his art."—LOUIS EYBOS. "The life of the poor peasant is very interesting. His letters are very extraordinary. Some of the additional songs [pub. in Currie's edit.] are much more perfect than his compositions published during his life; and there are some which I cannot help numbering amongst the happiest productions of human genius."—SIR JAMES MACINTOSH.

So discourses the Museum Criticum, but Bast calls attention to the fact that the whole of this work had originally appeared in the Lexicon of Plavirinna. Osann reprinted it at Berlin in 1821. Its value is not so unquestionable as the Museum Criticum would have us believe.

Burns, Robert, b. January 25, 1759, d. July 21, 1796, was a native of the Parish of Alloway, near Ayr, Scotland. His father, a small farmer, sent him to the county school in the neighbourhood, where he acquired a knowledge of the English branches, to which he subsequently added a limited acquaintance with Latin, French, and geometry. He eagerly devoured all the books which fell in his way, and Guthrie's Grammar, the Gardener's Directory, and Hervey's Meditations, engrossed the time spared from the Seasons of Thomson and the Plays of Shakespeare. When about 16 he "first committed," to use his own phraseology, "the sin of rhyme." His powers were first awakened, as is usually the case with young poets, by an affair of the heart. In essaying the accents of affection, his muse found its voice, and the gift once discovered was not likely to be disregarded. His poems circulated in manuscript through the country, and were much admired by his rural readers, and he had no inconsiderable fame as a poet, when some friends persuaded him to publish a volume in order to defray his expenses to Jamaica, where he hoped to obtain a situation as overseer on a plantation. His first project had been emigration to

"In preparing these critical notes, Dr. Burton examined for himself, with no small labour and attention, the copious materials which had been collected by Griesbach; and, after weighing the evidence adduced by him in favour of any particular reading, Dr. B. noted down all the variations from the received text, which seemed to have a majority of documents in their favour."—Horne's Introduction.

Burton, Henry, b. about 1579, d. 1648, a Puritan divine, was a native of Birstall, Yorkshire, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He became Rector of St. Matthew's, Friday Street, London, about 1626. In 1626 he preached and published two sermons, entitled, For God and the King, for which he was sentenced to the pillory, to lose his ears, to a fine of £5000, and to perpetual imprisonment. See BASTWICK, JOHN; PRYNNE, WILLIAM. The fine and the imprisonment were remitted by the House of Commons. He recovered his liberty in 1640, and was restored to his living. Two volumes of his Occasional Sermons, preached before the University of Oxford, were pub. in 1764. His style is considered pedantic, yet not without elegance, and has been distinguished as the "Burtonian style." Churchill ridicules its peculiarities:

"So dull his thoughts, yet pliant in their growth, They're verse, or prose, are neither, or are both."

But the poet disliked our author's opposition to Wilkes. He pub. in 1744 a vindication of Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, and in 1760 his three sermons on University politics. Burton, Robert, 1576-1639-40, a native of Lindley, Leicestershire, received the first rudiments of learning at the free school of Sutton Coldfield, Warwickshire, and at the grammar-school of Nuneaton. See Anat. of Melancholy; his will; and Athen. Oxon. He was admitted of Brasenose College, Oxford, 1593; elected a student of Christ Church, 1599; Reader of Sentences, 1614; Vicar of St. Thomas, Oxford, 1616; presented by George, Lord Berkeley, to the rectory of Seagrave, Leicestershire, 1636. He retained this post and his vicarage until his death, January 25, 1639-40. It is said that from his calculation of his nativity he predicted that he would die on or about the above date:

"Which being exact, several of the students did not venture to disagree among themselves that, rather than there should be a mistake in the calculation, he cut up his arm to have them a dip about his neck."—Atlas, Gann.

We should mention that on the left side of Burton's monument the curious reader may see the calculation of his activity, and his bust, painted to the life, adds to the interest of this monument of a most remarkable character. He bequeathed many of his books to the Bodleian Library; and they form one of its most curious collections. As the author of The Anatomy of Melancholy—what it is, with all the kinds, causes, symptoms, prognostics, and several cures of it—Burton's name will demand to remotest generations. It is next to impossible that so profound a treatise on a mental disorder to which a state of high intellectual cultivation is perhaps peculiarly liable can ever be permanently buried in the libraries of the learned. The 1st edit. was pub. in 1621, 4to. (Forrier gives 1617, but he errs.) and its popularity is evinced by the rapidity with which editions followed each other 1624, '26, '32, '38, '51, '52, '60, '76, 1728, '38, 4th. The eulogy of Dr. Johnson—"Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy," he said, "was the only book that ever took him out of bed two hours sooner than he wished to rise"—marked some courtesy to one so attractive a work, and an edit. was pub. in 1800, 8vo. and another in 1806, 2 vols. 8vo.; also in 1827, 2 vols. 8vo. 1836, 8vo. 1837, 3 vols. 8vo.; 1838, 8vo. 1844, 8vo.; 1849, 8vo. The author—a man of great erudition and wit—was subject to hypochondria, under which he suffered acutely:

"He imagined this book with a view of relieving his own melancholy but increased it to such a degree, that nothing could make him laugh, but going to the bridge head, and hearing the tinkling of the hammers, which rarely failed to throw him into a violent fit of laughter. Before he was overcome with this horrid disorder, he, in the intervals of his reason, was esteemed one of the most finished connoisseurs in the university."—On a note.

He was an exact mathematician, a curious calculator of matter, &c. a general read scholar, a thorough philosopher, and one that understood the surveying of lands well. As he was by many accounted a severe student, a devourer of authors, a melancholy and humorless person, so by others, who knew him well a person of great beauty, polite dealing and charity. I have heard some of the students of Ch. Ch. often say that his company was very merry, facetious and jovial, and so true to his time did corrupt him for his study and detestable interlarding his common discourses among them with verses from poets, or sentences from classical authors. Which being thus all the scholars in the university made his company more acceptable."—Atlas, Gann.

Charles Lamb mentions some "curious fragments from a commonplace book which belonged to Robert Burton, the famous author of The Anatomy of Melancholy," but we know of no publication save the Anatomy. Dibdin supposes that Dr. Tinsley Baines's (p. a.) Treatise of Melancholia, 1546, was the prototype of Burton's work, and it has been also insinuated that Bonyntown's Theatrum Mundi gave him some useful hints. These surmises may or may not be true, but of fathering books by means of supposed resemblances, there is no end. Whether Burton helped himself to his predecessors' labours or not, it is certain that he himself has been most carelessly plagiarized. It is very true that "from his storehouse of learning, interspersed with quaint observations and witty illustrations, many modern writers have drawn amply, without acknowledgment, particularly Sterne, who has copied the best of his pathos as well as humorous passages." See Forrier's Illustrations of Sterne, Lon., 1812, 3 vols. 8vo. Where the temptation is so great, we need not marvel at the theft. Lord Byron declares

"Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy is the most amusing and instructive method of quotations and classical allusions I ever found."

"If the reader has patience to go through his voluminous, he will be more improved in literary conversation than by the perusal of any twenty other works with which I am acquainted."

To Mr. Tegg's beautiful edit., Lon., 1844, 8vo., are prefixed some commendatory notices which we present to the reader, not without hopes of inducing him to procure the work, if he happen to be without it.

"The Anatomy of Melancholy, wherein the author hath gild up variety of much excellent learning. Burton says both of philosophy in our land both in so short a time, passed so many editions."—Atlas, Gann.

"To a book so full of variety of reading, that gentlemen who have lost their time, and are yet to be pushed by invention, may furnish themselves with matter for common or substantial discourses and writing."—Wood's Atlas, Gann. vol. 1, p. 323, 4th edit.

"If you never saw Burton upon Melancholy, printed 1624, pray look into it, and read the old page of his Preface. Commemorate to the Reader. There is something there which touches the poet to our eyes, but I mention the author to you, as the pleasantest, the most learned, and the most full of charming sense. The wit of Queen Anne's reign, and the beginning of George the First, was not a little indebted to him."—Archbishop Harcourt's Letters, 1777, p. 103.

"Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy is a valuable book," said Dr. Johnson. "It is perhaps overburdened with quotations. But there is great spirit and great power in what Burton says when he writes from his own mind."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, vol. 2, p. 305.

"It will be no deduction from the power of Burton's original genius and invention, to remark that he seems to have borrowed the subject of L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, together with some particular thoughts, expressions, and rhymes, more especially the idea of a contrast between these two dispositions, from a hypothesis poem prefixed to the first edition of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, entitled, The Author's Abstract of Melancholy, or, A Dialogue between Phlegmas and Pals. Here pain is melancholy. It was written, as I conjecture, about the year 1600. I will make no apology for abridging and citing so much of this poem as will be sufficient to prove, to a discerning reader, how far it had taken possession of Burton's mind. The measure will appear to be the same; and that our author was at least an attentive reader of Burton's book, may be already ascertained from the traces of resemblance which I have incidentally noticed in passing through the L'Allegro and Il Penseroso. As to the very elaborate work to which these visionary verses are so unsuitable introduction, the writer's variety of learning, his quotations from poets and curious books, his pungent sparkling wit with rude wit and eloquent elegance, miscellaneous matter interspersed of agreeable tales and illustrations, and, perhaps, above all the singularity of his feelings, clothed in an uncommon quondam of style, have been tributed to render it, even to modern readers, a valuable repository of an uncommon and interesting."—Boswell's Life of Johnson, vol. 2, p. 305.

"The Anatomy of Melancholy is a book which has been universally read and admired. This work is, for the most part, what the author himself calls it, 'a vein'; but it is a very ingenious one. The quotations, which abound in every page, are pertinent, and if he had made more use of his invention, and less of his compilation, both his work would perhaps have been more valuable than it is. He is generally free from the affected language and ridiculous metaphors which disfigure most of the books of his time."—Granger's Biographical History.

Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, a book since the favourite of the learned and the witty, and a source of surreptitious learning, though written on a regular plan, abounds chiefly of quotations. The author has beautifully termed it a mine. He collects, under every division, the opinions of a multitude of writers, without regard to chronological order and has too often the modesty to ascribe the interpretation of his own sentiments. Indeed the bulk of his materials generally overwhelms him. In the course of his life he has contrived to read a great variety of books, that will very handsomely contrast with the general subject, and, like Boyle, when he starts a favorite train of questions, he does not scruple to let the digression outrun the principal question. Thus, from the doctrine of religion to military discipline, from inland navigation to the morals of dancing-schools, every thing is digressed and digressed."—Forrier's Illustrations of Sterne, p. 55.

"The archness which Burton displays occasionally and his indulgence of playful digressions from the most serious discussions, often give his style an air of familiar conversation, notwithstanding the laborious collections which supply his text. He was capable of writing excellent poetry; but he seems to have cultivated this talent too little. The English verses prefixed to his book, which possess beautiful imagery and great ornaments of vocabulary, have been frequently published. His Latin elegiac verse addressed to his book, shows a very agreeable turn for the satirist."—Atlas, Gann.

"When the turn of the subject opens his own vein of genius, we discover valuable sense and brilliant expression. Such is his command of the first feelings of melancholy passions, written, probably from his own experience."—Atlas, Gann.

"During a prodigious age, like that in which Burton's production was entirely accessible to writers of the unlearned might furnish themselves of Greek and Latin, whilst none of letters flourished, by having more they might do and excursions had advanced on the side. I confess my inability to jot out any of his so largely dealt in apt and original bits of the late George Horner, Esq., of Melancholy."

BURTON, ROBERT, is a name which occurs in the title-page of a number of very popular historical and miscellaneous compilations, pub. (and supposed to have been written) by Nathaniel Crouch, from 1661-1726. These are such as Historical Rarities in London and Westminster, 1661; Wonderful Curiosities, Rarities, and Wonders in England, Scotland, and Ireland, 1662; History of Scotland, 1665; Curiousities of England, 1697; Unparalleled Varieties, 1699; General History of Rarities, 1726, &c. The list, which is a long one, will be found in Chalmers's Biog. Diet.; Watt's Dict. Brit.; Lowndes's Bibl. Manual. The collection includes History, Travels, Fiction, Nat. History, Customs, Biography, &c. Some were reprinted in 6 vols. 4to, 1810, 72. The original edit. have occasionally brought high prices as curiosities.

The following letter from Dr. Johnson to "Mr. Dilly in the Poultry," is interesting in this connection:

"January 8, 1781.
Sir,—There is in the world a set of books which used to be sold by the booksellers on the bridge, and which I must entreat you to procure me. They are called Burton's Books: the title of one is 'Admirable Curiosities, Rarities, and Wonders in England.' I believe there are about five or six of them [perhaps about 40!] they seem very proper to allure backward readers; be so kind as to get them for me, and send me them with the best printed edition of 'Baxter's Call to the Unconverted.' I am, &c.

"SAM. JOHNSON."

Dunton includes Crouch in his notices:

"R. B., (alias Nat. Crouch.) is become a celebrated Author. I think I have given you the very soul of his Character when I have told you that his talent lies at Collection. He has melted down the best of our English Histories into Twelve-penny Books which are filled with wonders, rarities, and curiosities; for you must know his Title-pages are a little swelling. However, Nat. Crouch is a very ingenious person, and can talk fine things upon any subject. In a word, Nat. Crouch is a Phoenix Author; I mean the only man that gets an estate by writing of Books."—Life and Errors.

Dunton speaks in high terms of Nat.'s brother, Samuel Crouch:

"He is just and punctual in all his dealings; never speaks ill of any man;—has a swinging soul of his own;—would part with all he has to serve a friend;—and that's enough for one BOOKSELLER!"—Ibid.

We commend Mr. Crouch's character to the study of our amiable and much-abused friends, the Bibliopoles of the present day.

Rutt, Lon., 1823, 4 vols. 8vo. These curious MSS. were discovered among the papers of Henry Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, "and own their publication to the same assiduous bibliographer who brought to light the Memoirs of Evelyn and Pepys."

"This Work serves to fill up the chasm so long existing in our Parliamentary History. The recovery of the debates of the Cromwell Parliaments, taken on the spot by one of the very members, is little short of a miracle."—New Monthly Mag.

"The great interest of the book is Cromwell himself."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

"These volumes overflow with information respecting the principles and proceedings of the Legislature during a most important period of English History. Every library which pretends to contain an historical collection, must possess itself of Burton's Diary: it is as indispensable as Burnet or Clarendon."—Lon. Atlas.

It is supposed that Burton's memoranda were taken for the information of Lord Clarendon, (in whose writing the MS. is,) then residing abroad with King Charles.

It must be a philological curiosity, truly!

Burton, William, 1575–1681, an eminent antiquary, was elder brother to the celebrated author of The Anatomy of Melancholy, (q. v.) He was entered of Brasenose College, Oxford, 1591, admitted of the Inner Temple, 1593. He distinguished himself by A Description of Leicestershire, concerning Matters of Antiquity, History, Armours, and Genealogy, Lon., 1622, fol. The author made many improvements and additions in MS. It is now entirely superseded by Nichols's History of Leicestershire.

"His natural genius leading him to the studies of Heraldry, Genealogies, and Antiquities, he became excellent in those obscure and intricate matters; and, look upon him as a gentleman, was accounted by all that knew him to be the best of his time for those studies, as may appear by his Description of Leicestershire."—Athen. Oxon.

"The reputation of Burton's book arises from its being written early, and preceded only by Lambarde's Kent, 1576, Carew's Cornwall, 1602, and Norden's Survey; and it is in comparison only of these, and not of Dugdale's more copious work, that we are to understand the praises so freely bestowed on it."—Gougeon.

Burton also drew up the Corollary of Leland's Life, prefixed to the Collectanea.

Burton, William, d. 1667, an antiquary, was entered of Queen's College, Oxford, in 1625. He was master of the free Grammar School at Kingston-upon-Thames until 1655. *Laudatio Funeris in Obitu D. Bury, Lady Charlotte, formerly Lady Charlotte Campbell, "the beauty of the Argyll family," was an early patroness of the youthful genius of Sir Walter Scott. She was "always distinguished by her passion for elegant letters," and was accustomed "in pride of rank, in beauty's bloom, to do the honours of Scotland" to the literary celebrities of the day. It was at one of her parties that Scott became personally acquainted with Monk Lewis. He writes to George Ellis, 2d March, 1802:

"I am glad you have seen the Marquess of Lorn, whom I have met frequently at the house of his charming sister, Lady Charlotte Campbell: whom, I am sure, if you are acquainted with her, you must admire as much as I do."

Lady Charlotte introduced him to Lady Anne Hamilton, and the poet had an opportunity of confirming the good impression made by the perusal of Glenfinlas, and The Eve of St. John. Lady Charlotte Bury, left a widow, was appointed to a place in the household of the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Charlotte. When the Diary illustrative of the Times of George IV. appeared, (4 vols. 8vo,) it was thought to bear evidence of a familiarity with the scenes depicted which could only be attributed to Lady Charlotte. It was reviewed with much severity, and charged to her Ladyship by Lord Brougham. We are not aware that the charge has ever been denied. The Quarterly Review joined in the condemnation. The book sold rapidly; several editions were disposed of in a few weeks; for there is a natural desire to know that which should not be told, especially if the actors be conspicuous for rank or celebrity. Lady Charlotte has published, also, a number of novels of the "Minerva" school, some of which have had a large circulation. Among them are Alla Giornata; or To The Day, 3 vols. p. 8vo. The Devoted, 3 vols. p. 8vo. The Disinterested and the Ennared, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Family Records; or The Two Sisters, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Flirtation, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Love, 3 vols. p. 8vo. Separation, 3 vols. p. 8vo.

Busby, C. A. Architect. Designs for Villages, &c., Lon., 1808, 4to.

Busby, Richard, D.D., 1606-1695, the most celebrated pedagogue that England has ever seen, was a king's scholar at Westminster, and elected a student of Christ Church, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A., 1628; M.A., 1631; D.D., 1660; and Prebendary of Westminster the same year. About 1640 he was appointed Head Master of Westminster School, where he flourished—save the time of Bagshaw's short triumph—for 55 years. See BAGSHAW, EDWARD. Dr. Busby was certainly successful in his profession.

"He bred up the greatest number of learned scholars that ever adorned any age or nation."

It is said that when the king entered his school-room, Busby would not remove his hat, not being willing that his boys should think that their master had any superior, and considering that he was as much a sovereign in his school as his majesty was in the kingdom. His liberal use of the birch, as a stimulus to latent genius, has become proverbial. This was one of the charges brought against the doctor by Bagshaw, also a teacher in the school. The whipping master was shocked at the loose discipline of his more gentle associate. Bagshaw says,

"Mr. Busby hath oft complained to me, and seemed to take it ill, that I did not use the rod enough. . . . I would wish there were some order taken to limit and restrain the exorbitance of punishment; that poor little boys may not receive thirty or forty, nay, sometimes sixty, lashes at a time for small and inconsiderable faults."

But Busby by no means gave up the point. He declared that the rod was his sieve, and that whoever could not pass through that, was no boy for him. Not desiring his opponents to rest satisfied with his theory, he pointed to the Bench of Bishops, where sat sixteen "grave and reverend" prelates, formerly his pupils. How could loyal adherents of Church and State withstand this argument? If No Bishop no Church, and No Bishop no King, and No Birch no Bishop, let flagellation reign! When South—afterwards so celebrated a divine—came to Busby, he was as heavy, untractable, and stubborn a chiel as ever tried the patience of a Dominie. But the master of Westminster gauged his mind. He discovered—far in the depths indeed—genius of no common order. Busby determined to bring it to light.

"I see," said he, "great talents in that sulky boy, and I shall endeavour to bring them out."

South was now put through a course of exercises of the most animated and vigorous character. The process was a tedious one, a painful one—but it succeeded. Busby, triumphant, laid by the rod for the benefit of the next undeveloped genius, and South ascended the pulpit stairs, perhaps the first preacher in England. That he, too, was not, with the sixteen other scholars of Busby, a bishop, was his own fault. Doubtless Dr. South and his former preceptor often referred to these touching scenes, when in after days the old schoolmaster took his seat, an honoured guest at the celebrated churchman's table. Busby was not only a profound classical scholar, but his powers of oratory, and even of acting, were most remarkable. Had he adopted the stage as a profession, he would probably have been as distinguished as Betterton or Garrick. He pub. some grammatical works, in the preparation of which he probably permitted his ushers to aid him. Such is Wood's conjecture.

Bush, Francis, Surgeon. Con. to Med. Chir. Trans., 1811; a knife lodged in the muscles.

Bush, George, b. 1796, Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Literature in the city of New York, has gained considerable distinction by profound learning, pulpit eloquence, and peculiarities of opinion. He was educated at Dartmouth College, and at the Princeton Theological Seminary, officiated for some years as a Presbyterian minister, accepted his professorship in 1831. In 1845 he avowed his reception of the doctrines of Swedenborg, and he has since zealously laboured in their defence. An interesting sketch of Professor Bush and his opinions will be found in Griswold's Prose Writers of America. His first work was the Life of Mohammed, pub. 1832, (Harper's Family Library, vol. 10th.) In 1836 he pub. a Treatise on the Millennium, in which views contrary to those generally entertained were set forth. The Hebrew Grammar was pub. in 1835; 2d edit., 1838. In 1840 he commenced the publication of his Commentaries on the books of the Old Testament, viz.: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Joshua, Judges, and Numbers, forming 8 vols. These have been highly commended:

"With the fullest satisfaction we direct attention to this valuable contribution from transatlantic shores, to Biblical literature and Christian theology. . . . There is a union of the critical and the practical which adapts the work to popular use as well as to the requirements of the ministerial student."—Scottish Pilot.

"We regard Bush's work on Joshua and Judges as a very valuable addition to the number of Commentaries on the whole or parts of the Holy Scriptures. The professor has an enviable talent for elucidating the sacred text."—Lon. Herald of Peace.

See also the Lon. Home Miss. Mag.

"The real object of a commentary, which is not to supersede the text, but to excite attention to it, appears to be as nearly attained in this volume, as in any work we could name. The author happily avoids that generalizing manner which detracts from the value of many celebrated works, by rendering them of little use in the way of quotation."—Lon. Genl. Mag.; notice of the Notes on Genesis.

A Commentary on the Book of Psalms on a plan embracing the Hebrew Text, with a new literal version, New York, 1848, 8vo.

"This work will be very useful to Biblical students who commence their Hebrew studies with the Book of Psalms."—Horne's Introduction.

"The notes are designed principally to elucidate the force, import, and pertinency of the words and phrases of the original, by the citation of parallel instances, and to throw light upon the images and allusions of the sacred writers by reference to the customs, manners, law, geography, &c. of the East."—Andover Biblical Repository, v. 239.

In 1836 Prof. Bush pub. his very valuable Illustrations of the Holy Scriptures, laboriously compiled from 46 British and foreign writers. This work should be in the hands of every Biblical student. In 1814 he pub. in the Hierophant some elaborate papers upon Prophetic symbols, &c. Much attention was excited by a work of the professor's pub. in 1841, entitled Anastasis, or the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body, Rationally and Spiritually Considered. It does not come within our design to consider the supposed correctness or unsoundness of works written with the intention of promoting the cause of truth. We profess to occupy the position of the chronicler, not the umpire. The opinions of the learned professor have elicited much animated controversy. He has given to the world an exposition of some of the phenomena of Mesmerism, and he anticipates great benefits to the race from the full development of the new philosophy of which he is an ardent champion. In addition to his other labours, Prof. Bush preaches to a society of the New Jerusalem Church in Brooklyn and edits the Anglo-American New Church Repository.

"Leaving behind him the character of one always troubled with a beating and contriving brain, of an almer at great and high things, while he himself was always indigent, and therefore could never accomplish his mind to his original desire; of one always borrowing to carry on his design, but seldom or never paid."

Yet we should not omit to state that there were times when Bushel had no lack of the precious metals. He is said to have gained from one silver mine at Bwlch-yr-Eskir, sufficient profit to enable him to present Charles I. with a regiment of horse, and to provide clothes for his whole army. In addition to this, he advanced as a loan to his Majesty no less a sum than £40,000; equal to at least four times the amount of the present currency; and he also raised a regiment among miners at his own charge. The mine referred to is the same one out of which Sir Hugh Middleton accumulated £2000 a month, "by which produce he was enabled to defray the expense of bringing the New River to London."

He has been a journalist, and a law student, as well as theologian. Among his publications are Christian Nurture, 1847; God in Christ, 1849; and a sequel to these, entitled Christian Theology, 1851. He has pub. a number of sermons, Unconscious Influence, &c.,—which have been collected in one volume, entitled Sermons for the New Life, 1858, 12mo. Many of his pieces will be found in The New Englander; and his addresses before college societies and literary assemblies are numerous.

"His writings have attracted considerable attention among theologians from the bold and original manner in which he has presented views of the doctrines of the Calvinistic faith. . . . Bute, John Stuart, third Earl of, 1713-1792. This most unpopular statesman is said to have played himself into the favour of the Prince of Wales, as Sir Christopher Hatton danced himself into Queen Elizabeth's. His Lordship took refuge from the arrows of Junius in his Paradise of Shrubs. He printed a work upon his favourite pursuit in 9 vols. 4to.—Botanical Tables, &c.—at an expense of £10,000 for 12 copies. Dr. Dutens thus speaks of his lordship and his expensive book:

"L'étude favorite de Lord Bute étoit la botanique; il excelloit tellement dans cette science, que les plus grands maîtres en Europe le consultoient et recherchoient sa correspondance; il l'avoit écrit sur ce sujet un ouvrage en 9 vols. in 4to, qu'il fit imprimer à grands frais. Il l'avoit composé pour la Reine d'Angleterre, et ne vouloit jamais le publier, tant il étoit éloigné de tirer vanité de ses lumbrées. Il en fit tirer 16 exemplaires, dont il me donna un."—Mémoires d'un Voyageur qui se Repose, vol. II. p. 262.

One of Lord Bute's copies sold in 1798, with Mr. Tighe's books, produced £120; and the late Queen Charlotte's copy was sold in 1819, for £117. A copy was sold in 1813 for £82 19s. The plates are said to have been destroyed. See Gentleman's Mag. for 1792, p. 285; Martin's Bibliographical Catalogue of Privately Printed Books, and Dryander's Catalogues: the latter remarks:

"Opera hujus, splendidi magis quam utilis, duodecim tantum exemplaria impressa sunt."

Butler, Alban, 1700-1773, a native of Northampton, was sent in his eighth year to the English Roman Catholic College at Douay, where he was subsequently appointed Professor of Divinity. Whilst at this seat of learning, he pub. his Letters on the History of the Popes, by Archibald Bower.

"They are written with ease and good humour, they show various and extensive learning, a vigorous and candid mind. They met with universal applause."—CHARLES BUTLER.

In 1745 he travelled through France and Italy with the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Messrs. Talbot, and on his return was appointed to a mission in Staffordshire, though anxious for a London residence, which would permit access to such works as he desired to consult in the compilation of his History of the Saints. Shortly after reaching England, he was appointed Chaplain to Edward, Duke of Norfolk, and accompanied Edward Howard, his nephew, to the Continent. Whilst at Paris he sent to the press his Lives of the Saints, upon which he had laboured more or less for thirty years. It was pub. Lon., 1745, 5 vols. 4to; Dublin, 1780, 12 vols. 8vo. In the edit. before us, the imprimatur of the prelates is dated January 29th, 1833; pub. (1836) at Dublin, 2 r. 8vo vols., with a preface by Bishop Doyle, and life of the author by his nephew, CHARLES BUTLER, (q. v.) In the first edit. the notes were omitted. This step was taken at the advice of Mr. Challoner, Vicar-apostolic of the London district, who thought that the work would be too costly for general circulation unless reduced in size. An edit., considered the best, was pub. in 1847, Lon., 12 vols. 8vo; the continuation by C. Butler should be added. "It is easy to suppose," remarks his nephew and biographer, Charles Butler, "what it must have cost our author to consign to oblivion the fruit of so much labour, and so many vigils. He obeyed, however." Happily they were restored in the subsequent editions. The Lives of the Saints is a curious storehouse of ecclesiastical and secular learning.

"The erudition, the beauty of style, the true spirit of religion, and the mild and conciliating language, which pervade this work, edified all its readers, disposed them to be pleased with a religion in which they saw so much virtue, allayed their prejudices against its professors, and led them to consider the general body with good will. It has been translated into French, Spanish, and Italian; and, though a bulky and expensive work, has gone through several editions."—CHARLES BUTLER.

Gibbon remarks of this compilation,

"It is a work of merit:—the sense and learning belong to the author; the prejudices are those of his profession."

Upon which Charles Butler remarks with his usual graceful and gentlemanly humour:

"As it is known what prejudice means in Mr. Gibbon's vocabulary, our author's relatives accept the character."

The Rev. Alban Butler also pub. The Life of Mary of the Cross.

"It is rather a vehicle to convey instruction on various important duties of a religious life, and on sublime prayer, than a minute account of the life and actions of the nun."—CHARLES BUTLER.

He left an unfinished Treatise on the Movable Feasts, which was pub. by Mr. Challoner, (an edit., Dublin, 1839, 8vo.); and Charles Butler pub. his Short Life of Sir Toby Matthews. The Rev. Mr. Jones superintended the publication of three vols. of his Meditations and Discourses, issued in 1791, since the author's decease; new edit., by Dr. Lanigan, Dublin, 1840, 8vo.

"They are acknowledged to possess great merit; the morality of them is entitled to great praise; the discourse on conversation shows a considerable knowledge of life and manners. . . . His sermons were sometimes interesting and pathetic; but they were always desultory, and almost always immeasurably long."—CHARLES BUTLER.

He made collections for the Lives of Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More, which, it is to be regretted, with several other projected works, were never given to the world. Sometime after his return to England from his travels with Mr. Howard, he was chosen President of the English College at St. Omer's, which responsible position he filled until the day of his death—in 1773. He was always much attached to literary pursuits, and ever ready to assist the learned investigations of others. He aided Cardinal Quirini in his edition of Cardinal Pole's Letters, who makes this handsome acknowledgment of his valuable co-operation:

"The Letters were procured for the author by Mr. Alban Butler, to whom the public is indebted for the most useful and valuable work which has appeared in the English language on the Lives of the Saints, and which has been so much esteemed in France, that it is now translated into the language of a country celebrated for biography, with large additions by the author. This gentleman's readiness on all occasions to assist the author in his undertaking was answerable to his extensive knowledge, and general acquaintance with whatever has any relation to erudition."

The value of Quirini's commendation is so well known to scholars to require to be enlarged on here.

Mr. Butler pursued his studies with such zeal that we are assured by one of his friends that "Every instant that Mr. Butler did not dedicate to the government of his college, he employed in study; and when obliged to go abroad, he would read as he walked along the streets. I have met him with a book under each arm, and a third in his hands, and have been told, that, travelling one day on horseback, he fell a reading, giving the horse his full liberty. The creature used it to eat a few ears of corn that grew on the roadside. The owner came in haste, swearing that he would be indemnified. Mr. Butler, who knew nothing of the damage done, no sooner perceived it, than, blushing, he said to the countryman, with his usual mildness, that his demand was just; he then draws out a louis-d'or, and gives it to the fellow, who would have been very well satisfied with a few pence, makes repeated apologies to him, easily obtains forgiveness, and goes on his way."

The character of Alban Butler was most exemplary. L'Abbé de la Sepouse thus speaks of him:

"What astonished me most was, that studies so foreign to the supernatural objects of piety, shed over his soul neither aridity nor lukewarmness. He referred all things to God, and his discourse always concluded by some Christian reflections, which he skillfully drew from the topic of his conversation. His virtue was neither minute nor pusillanimous: religion had in his discourse, as well as in his conduct, that solemn gravity which can alone make it worthy of the Supreme Being. Ever composed, he feared neither contradictions nor adversities: he dreaded nothing but praises. He never allowed himself a word that could injure any one's reputation. . . . In short, I will confess it to my confusion that for a long time I sought to discover a failing in him; and I protest, by all that is sacred, that I never knew one in him." See the whole of this interesting letter in the Account of the Life and Writings of Alban Butler, prefixed to the Lives of the Saints.

"The only theoretical or didactic work published on the subject of music during the reign of Charles I. It contains more knowledge in a small compass than any other of the kind in our language; but the Saxon and new characters he uses, in order to explode such characters as are redundant, or of uncertain powers, render this musical tract somewhat difficult to peruse." See Dr. Burney's Gen. Hist. of Music.

Butler, Charles, 1750-1832, a learned Roman Catholic, and eminent lawyer, was the nephew of ALBAN BUTLER, (q. v.) and a native of London. He was educated at the English Roman Catholic College at Douay, where he was noted for his talents and studious application. He was entered of Lincoln's Inn, in 1775, and was called to the bar in 1791, being the first barrister of the Roman Catholic communion since the Revolution: he never argued any case save the one of Cholmondeley v. Clinton. In 1832 he accepted from the chancellor a silk gown, and was made a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn. Mr. Butler was a zealous champion of the religious faith which he professed, whilst not unmindful of those amenities without which there is little hope of rectifying the opinions of others or recommending our own. The character which he gives of his uncle, the celebrated author of The Lives of the Saints, is a higher eulogy in his own favour than any we could indite.

"He was zealous in the cause of religion, but his zeal was without bitterness or animosity: polemic acrimony was unknown to him. He never forgot that in every heretic he saw a brother Christian; in every infidel he saw a brother man."—Charles Butler's Life of Alban Butler.

In 1778 he pub. an Essay on the Legality of Impressment Seamen. Mr. Hargrave had left unfinished, after seven years' labour, his edit. of Coke upon Littleton. Mr. Butler took the remainder—nearly half the work—in hand, and finished it in four terms, according to his contract. We by no means assert, however, that Mr. Butler did as much work as Mr. Hargrave. Our reference is only to the calendar. We notice other publications of Mr. Butler.

Horæ Biblicæ; being a Series of Miscellaneous Notes on the original Text, early Versions, and printed Editions, of the Old and New Testaments, 1797, 8vo; not sold; printed for the author's friends. Part 2, 1804, 8vo; 1807, vol. i., 4th edit.; vol. ii., 2d edit. The second vol. treats of the books accounted sacred by the Mohammedans, Hindoos, Parsees, Chinese, and Scandinavians.

"An elegant work, the production of the leisure hours of Mr. Butler. It does great credit to his learning, research, candour, and good sense. It supplies in a narrow compass a large portion of useful information on all the topics of which it treats, and directs to the sources whence it is chiefly drawn. In an appendix, the ingenious writer gives a literary outline of the disputes on the authenticity of 1 John v. 7; in which the evidence on both sides is stated with great candour and accuracy. The fifth edition of the Horæ Biblicæ is inserted in a collection of Mr. Butler's Philological and Biographical Works, 1817, 5 vols. 8vo."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

"An elegant and interesting work."—Dr. T. F. DIXON. In 1810 M. Bouillard pub. in Paris, 8vo, a French trans. of this work, from the edit. printed at Oxford in 1799. Horæ Juridicæ Subsecivæ; being a connected Series of Notes concerning the Geography, Chronology, and Literary History of the principal Codes and original Documents of the Grecian, Roman, Feudal, and Canon Law, Lon., 1804, 8vo; 1807, 8vo; 3d edit., with additions, Lon., 1830, 8vo; pub. in Philad., 1808.

"The author in the compilation of this work, appears to have freely used Schomburgk's Elements of the Roman Law, ('an amusing and superficial little work,') with a sprinkling of authorities borrowed from Gibbon's 44th chapter. It is an unfavourable specimen of Mr. Butler's labours, being noted neither for accuracy nor depth of research. It contains, however, useful information upon the subjects of which it treats, and refers the student to authorities to assist him in a further prosecution of each head of inquiry." See Marrin's Legal Bibl.; 2 Hoffman's Leg. Student, 523; 8 Westminster Review, 422.

It is included in vol. 2d of Mr. Butler's works.

In 1806 the Emperor of Austria renounced the empire of Germany, and a question arose on its territorial extent. This led to the publication of Mr. Butler's Notes on the chief Revolutions of the principal States which composed the Empire of Charlemagne, &c., 1807, 8vo, repub. in 1812, 8vo, under the title of A Succinct History of the Geographical and Political Revolutions in the Empire of Germany, or the Principal States which composed the Empire of Charlemagne, &c. This work did the author great credit.

"There has been a book published by Mr. Butler on the German Constitution that I consider invaluable. Here will be found all the outlines of the subject. Let the detail be studied, wherever it is thought necessary, in Gibbon, [Lecture i.] I must once more remind you that the work on the German Empire is indispensably necessary. Respecting this essay the author remarks in a letter to Dr. Parr:

"The chief aim of all my writings has been to put Catholic and Protestant into good humour with one another, and Catholics into a good humour with themselves. . . . I never had any notion that the reunion of Christians was practicable."

It is certainly better to agree to disagree, than to disagree in the effort to agree.

A Continuation of the Rev. Alban Butler's Lives of the Saints to the present time, &c., 1823. The Book of the Roman Catholic Church, in a Series of Letters addressed to Robert Southey, Esq., in his Book of the Church, 1825, 8vo. Mr. Southey refers to this publication in his letters to John May, Esq., March 16, and to Rev. Robert Philip, Aug. 15, 1825: he reviewed it also in the Quart. Review, xxxiii. 1; xxxvi. 305: see also Edin. Review, xliii. 125. As we have not room to quote the statements of both parties, of course we shall give neither. Mr. Butler in the second vol., p. 59, of his Reminiscences, enumerates no less than ten replies which were elicited by this work. He answered his objectors in A Letter to the Rt. Rev. C. J. Blomfield, Bishop of Chester, 1825, and in his Vindication of the Book of the Roman Catholic Church, &c., 1826, 8vo. The Vindication elicited six additional replies (1) See Butler's Reminiscences, vol. ii. 62, which were noticed by Mr. B. in an Appendix to his Vindication. His Reminiscences, a most interesting work, was pub. vol. i. 1822; vol. ii. 1827. For a biographical sketch of Mr. Butler, and notices of his publications, see Gent. Mag., 1832, 269. We have already referred to the collective edit. of his works, Lon., 1817, 5 vols. 8vo. Mr. Butler, following the example of his celebrated uncle, was a most diligent student. He tells us that "Very early rising, a systematic division of his time, abstinence from all company, and from all diversions not likely to amuse him highly,—from reading, writing, or even thinking on modern party politics,—and, above all, never permitting a scrap of time to be unemployed,—have supplied him with an abundance of literary hours. His literary acquisitions are principally owing to the rigid observance of four rules: to direct his attention to one literary object only at a time; to read the best work upon it, consulting others as little as possible; when the subjects were contentious, to read the best book on each side; to find out men of information, and when in their society, to listen, not to talk."

His discourses and two charges were collected by him, and pub. in 1801, under the title of Select Sermons, &c., 8vo.

"They appear to be the plain, serious, and impressive dictates of the mind. They abound not with laboured ornaments and well-turned periods, but with attractions of a preferable kind,—with sound sense and rational piety. Butler, Joseph, 1692-1752, a very eminent prelate, was born at Wantage, in Berkshire, where his father, a Presbyterian, was a respectable tradesman. Joseph was the youngest of eight children, and evinced at an early age those powers of mind for which he afterwards became so distinguished. His father designed him for the ministry in his own denomination, and placed him at a Dissenting academy in Tewkesbury; but an examination of the principles of the Church of England resulted in a determination to enter its communion. Accordingly in 1714 he was received as a commoner of Oriel College, Oxford. At college he formed a friendship with Mr. Edmund Talbot, son of Bishop Talbot, and to this fortunate alliance he was indebted for his future preferment. In 1718 he was appointed preacher at the Rolls, which post he retained till 1726, in the beginning of which year he published Fifteen Sermons preached at the Rolls Chapel, of which a second edition appeared in 1729. Subsequently there were added to this collection, Six Sermons preached upon public occasions.

"In these admirable discourses may plainly be discovered the germs of those principles of analogy which were afterwards developed by him in his celebrated work."

"Of these Sermons, considered as disquisitions on the philosophy of morals and religion, it is difficult to speak in terms of proper and commensurate commendation. They exhibit a rare combination of nearly all the excellencies of which compositions of this class are susceptible, and are, generally, remarkably free from most of the defects and blemishes of abstrusely argumentative sermons. They are chargeable, however, with one serious and capital deficiency—a deficiency of evangelical sentiment."—Cromwellham's Hist. Hist.

"Able and argumentative, but fitter for the closet than the pulpit. More useful to give habits of thinking, than to raise to communion with God."—BICKERSTETH.

In 1722 he was presented by Bishop Talbot with the benefice of Haughton, which he exchanged in 1725 for that of Stanhope, where he remained for seven years. He was in this retired country parish, when Queen Caroline asked whether he was not dead; to which it was answered, "No, madam, but he is buried." In 1733 he was appointed Chaplain to the Lord-Chancellor Talbot; and in three years afterwards he was made clerk of the closet to her Majesty. In 1738 he was raised to the Bishopric of Bristol, and in 1750 was translated to the See of Durham. In the following year he delivered to the clergy of his diocese a charge, in which he sets forth the great value of external forms and institutes in religion. This charge was published, and elicited a pamphlet from an anonymous writer, entitled, A Serious Inquiry into the Use and Importance of External Religion, occasioned by some passages in the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Durham's Charge to the Clergy of that Diocese. He was a man of uncommon liberality of disposition, and expended £4000 in the repairs and embellishment of the episcopal palace at Bristol—which was a larger sum than he received from the bishopric during his continuance in the see. He one day asked his steward how much money was in the house; to which it was answered, "Five hundred pounds." "Five hundred pounds!" exclaimed the worthy prelate, "what a shame for a bishop to have so much money in the house at one time!" He then ordered a great part of it to be distributed to the poor. Shortly after he had been seated in his new bishopric, his health began to decline, and in 1752 he died at Bath, in the sixty-first year of his age. He was never married. The piety of Bishop Butler was full of seriousness, humility, and fervour. Fifteen years after his decease, a declaration was published by an anonymous writer to the effect that the bishop had died in the communion of the Church of Rome. This falsehood was simply refuted by Archbishop Secker.

"This strange slander, founded on the weakest pretences, and most trivial circumstances, that can be imagined, no one was better qualified to confute than the archbishop; as well from his long and intimate knowledge of Bishop Butler, as from the information given him at the time, by those who attended his lordship in his last illness, and were with him when he died."—Ep. Fortescue's Life of Secker.

The last edit. of his works, with a Preface by Bishop Hallifax, was pub. in 1849, 2 vols. 8vo, at the Oxf. Univ. Press.

We now come to speak of that great work, which will secure the veneration of the world for the name of Butler, as long as either religion or philosophy are held in esteem by mankind. The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the constitution and course of nature, appeared in the same year in which the author was made clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline. This work is less surprising when considered as the production of the same mind which twenty-five years before (when Butler was a youth of nineteen at the Tewkesbury Academy) had astonished Doctor Clarke with the profundity of its disquisitions on his Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God. It has been remarked that "the same reach and sagacity of intellect which characterize all Butler's subsequent performances are exhibited to the greatest advantage in these letters to Dr. Clarke."

The Analogy ever "since its first publication, has been universally considered as beyond comparison the ablest treatise on the philosophy of religion. As a preparation for the student of the evidences of natural and revealed religion, it is invaluable; since it both annihilates the most formidable a priori objections of the infidel, and is admirably fitted to form the mind to the serious and earnest pursuit of truth. To good men of a speculative turn of mind, who are tormented by the frequent recurrence of skeptical doubts, it has always proved an inestimable blessing; and even infidels have been compelled to acknowledge its superlative excellence as a piece of reasoning."

"Bishop Butler is one of those creative geniuses who give a character to their times. His great work, The Analogy of Religion, has fixed the admiration of all competent judges for nearly a century, and will continue to be studied so long as the language in which he wrote endures. The mind of a master pervades it. . . . There are in his writings a vastness of ideas, a reach and generalization of reasoning, a native simplicity and grandeur of thought, which command and fill the mind. . . . He is amongst the few classic authors of the first rank in modern literature. He takes his place with Bacon and Pascal and Newton."—Br. Wilson: Pref. to Anal.

Mr. Hallam, in a dissertation of considerable length upon Bishop Cumberland's De Legibus Naturæ Disquisitio Philosophica, shows under what obligations both Butler and Paley rested to this author. (Introduction to the Lit. Hist. of Europe.)

Butler quotes the following observation of Origen's, (Philocal.,) and perhaps we may consider it as the text upon which he based his Analogy:

"He who believes the Scriptures to have proceeded from Him who is the author of Nature, may well expect to find the same sort of difficulties in it as are found in the constitution of Nature."

"Others had established the historical and prophetic grounds of the Christian Religion, and that sure testimony of its truth which is found in its perfect adaptation to the heart of man: it was reserved for him to develop its analogy to the constitution and course of nature; and, laying his strong foundations in the depth of that great argument, there to construct another and irrefragable proof, thus rendering Philosophy subservient to Faith; and finding in outward and visible things, the type and evidence of them within the veil."—From the Epitaph on his Monument in Bristol Cathedral.

"To a mind disposed to view with calmness, humility, and reverence, the whole system of providence, so far as it is permitted to man to view 'the work which God maketh from the beginning to the end,' Dr. Butler has unfolded the analogy, or relation of the course of nature to religion, by which all things are found to proceed in harmony from Him, who hath made nothing imperfect. I think this great performance of Butler has peculiar force, when it is considered in the conclusion of our religious researches, and not as part of the original proofs; or as Lord Bacon expresses himself, 'Tanquam portum et Sabbathum humanarum contemplationum omnium.' [De Aug. Scientiar., lib. III.]"—Pursuits of Literature.

Dr. Chalmers pronounces Bishop Butler's Sermons to contain

"The most precious repository of sound ethical principles extant in any language."

But Dr. Wardlaw, in his Christian Ethics, designates Bishop Butler's moral system as that "of Zeno baptized into Christ."

"That there is such a thing as a course of nature none can deny. This, therefore, is the ground on which Butler takes his stand, whereon he fixes a lever that shakes the strongholds of unbelief even to their foundation; for on comparing this scheme of nature with the scheme of revelation, there is found a most singular correspondence between the several parts,—such a correspondence as gives very strong reason for believing that the author of one is the author of both.

"What if earth
Be but the shadow of heaven, and things therein
Each to each other like, more than on earth is thought."

See Quarterly Review, vol. xliii. 182.
"No author has made a more just and a more happy use of this mode of reasoning than Bishop Butler, in his Analogy of Religion. . . In that excellent work the author does not ground any of the truths of religion upon analogy as their proper evidence; he only makes use of analogy to answer objections against them. When objections are made against the truths of religion, which may be made with equal strength against what we know to be true in the course of nature, such objections can have no weight."—Reid's Essays on the Intellectual Powers.

Dr. Reid also notices in his Active Powers, Essay 3d, the important distinction which Bp. Butler makes "Between sudden anger or resentment, which is a blind impulse, arising from our constitution, and that which is deliberate. The first may be raised by hurt of any kind; but the last can only be raised by injury, real, or conceived. Both these kinds of anger or resentment are raised whether the hurt or injury be done to ourselves, or to those we are interested in."

To the Analogy are appended two dissertations: 1. On Personal Identity. 2. On the Nature of Virtue. In the first, Mr. Locke's account of personal identity is considered and

"Refuted in a style which shows that had he concentrated his attention upon the philosophy of the human mind, he might have eclipsed the fame of some of the greatest metaphysicians. In the second, he propounds and illustrates with great perspicuity the same theory of virtue on which he had before insisted in the preface to his sermons."

"We think that the illustrious Bishop of Durham has exhausted the subject [Personal Identity] by stating fairly the opinions which he controverts, and by establishing his own upon a foundation which cannot be shaken, and which are certainly not injured by the objections of Mr. Cooper."—Encyc. Brit.

Our eminent author has been compared with the celebrated American philosopher—Jonathan Edwards.

"Mr. Edwards comes nearer Bishop Butler as a philosophical divine than any other theologian with whom we are acquainted. His style, like Butler's, is very much that of a man thinking aloud. In both these authors, the train of thinking in their own minds is more clearly exhibited to us than perhaps by any other author, whilst they show us with great truth and distinctness, what their notions are, and how they came by them, with very little concern about the form of expression in which they are conveyed. Butler, however, had a larger mind than Edwards, and was by no means so much of a mere dialectician. If, therefore, he be less acute than the American, he is more comprehensive, and gives shiner play to every opposing argument."—Encyc. Brit.

Lord Kames, speaking of devotion as being natural to man, adds, in a note,

"See this principle beautifully explained and illustrated in a Sermon upon the Love of God, by Doctor Butler, Bishop of Durham,—a writer of the first rank."—Sketches of the History of Man, vol. iv.

"Every reader of Butler's Sermons must be sensible, that they afford an admirable proof of his sagacity in treating moral questions. We cannot but think that what he hath advanced, on the several subjects discussed by him, is decisive; and that he ought forever to have silenced those philosophers who resolve all human actions into the sole principle of self-love. It should be remembered, that our author's Sermons are chiefly to be considered as philosophical and moral discourses, addressed to a select auditory; for they can by no means be regarded as general models of preaching."

The obscurity of Butler's style has been frequently objected to. And yet both the Sermons and the Analogy had received the revision of the accurate and perspicuous Secker. Mainwaring, in his Dissertation on the Composition of Sermons, whilst he greatly commended Bishop Butler's writings, also refers to this imputed want of clearness of style:

"Newton and Locke, who rescued learning from the slavery of systems, and taught men to think for themselves, were both of the laity, and both friends to revealed religion. Since their time, another writer arose, whose vein of thinking is alike original, and whose works, though he had neither the gift of eloquence, nor the art of expressing himself with grace or ease, have done honour to his country. The method of reasoning he chiefly adopts, is an appeal to facts, of which all men are judges; and even when most abstruse or abstracted, it is not perplexed or fallacious. For metaphysics, which had nothing to support it but mere abstraction, or shadowy speculation, Bishop Butler hath placed on the firm basis of observation and experiment: and, by pursuing precisely the same mode of reasoning in the science of morals, as his great predecessor Newton had done in the system of nature, hath formed and concluded a happy alliance between faith and philosophy. The Sermons he published, excepting some few of a more popular cast, are deep disquisitions on the plan of his Analogy, well suited to a learned audience, in an age so fond of enquiry, although the imperipety of preaching then appeared to him to require some apology. But surely such an exercise of the understanding, if the hearers are capable of it, must mollerate the heart. Besides, I cannot but wish, that, as there is so great an abundance of the practical sort, some sermons were written chiefly with a view to readers; and those, too, persons of an improved taste, and cultivated minds."

Few productions of the human mind have elicited the labours of so many learned commentators as have employed their talents in the exposition of Butler's Analogy. We notice the editions of (1) Duke; 2. Busby, 1840; 3. Pughe, 1842; 4. Halifax, last ed., 1844; 5. Wilson, 7th ed., 1846; 6. Sir G. W. Craufurd, 3d ed., 1847; 7. Wilkinson, 1847; last ed., 1853; 8. Fitzgerald, 1848; 9. Hutton, last ed., 1855; 10. Angus, 1855; 11. Gorle, 1857; 12. Steers, 1857. To these may be added the American edita.: 13. Bishop Hobart; 14. Rev. B. F. Tefft; 15. Rev. Albert Barnes, last ed., (Lon.,) 1851; 16. Rev. Drs. Emory and Crooks, 1856; 17. Howard Malcom, D.D., 1857.

"His great work on the Analogy of Religion to the Course of Nature, though only a commentary on the singularly original and pregnant passage of Origen, which is so honestly prefixed to it as a motto, is notwithstanding, the most original and profound work extant in any language, on the Philosophy of Religion. His ethical discussions are contained in those deep, and sometimes dark Dissertations, which he preached at the Chapel of the Rolls, and afterwards published under the name of Sermons, while he was yet fresh from the schools, and full of that courage with which youth often delights to exercise its strength in abstract reasoning, and to push its faculties into the recesses of abstruse speculation. . . . In these sermons he has taught truths, more capable of being exactly distinguished from the doctrines of his predecessors, more satisfactorily established by him, more comprehensively applied to particulars, more rationally connected with each other, and therefore more worthy of the name of discovery, than any with which we are acquainted; if we ought not, with some hesitation, to except the first steps of the Grecian philosophers towards a theory of morals. . . . There are few circumstances more remarkable than the small number of Butler's followers in Ethics; and it is perhaps still more observable, that his opinions were not so much rejected, as overlooked. It is an instance of the impotence of style. No thinker so great as ever so had a writer. Indeed, the ingenious apologies which have been lately attempted for this defect, amount to no more than that his power of thought was too much for his skill in language. How general must the reception have been of truths so certain and momentous as those contained in Butler's Discourses—with how much more clearness must they have appeared to his own great understanding, if he had possessed the strength and distinctness with which Hobbes enforces odious falsehood, or the unspeakable charm of that transparent diction which clothed the unfruitful paradoxes of Berkeley!"—SIR JAMES MACINTOSH: 2d Freitas. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

From the preface to Dr. Angus's edit. (which the Rev. Dr. T. H. Horne, in a private letter, especially commends as worthy of our attention) we extract the following:

Butler, Samuel, 1612–1680, the author of Hudibras, was a native of Strensham, a parish in Worcestershire. He was sent to the cathedral school in Worcester, and thence, it is said, to Cambridge, but to what college is not known. Returning home, he became a clerk to Mr. Jeffries of Earls Croombe, which situation he was so fortunate as to exchange for a place in the household of Elizabeth, Countess of Kent, where he made the acquaintance and friendship of her ladyship's steward, the great Selden. This intimacy was no doubt improved by Butler to his intellectual profit. We subsequently find him as inmate in the family of Sir Samuel Luke, a gentleman of Bedfordshire, and a commander of note under Cromwell. Sir Samuel is the original of Hudibras. After the Restoration he was made secretary to Richard, Earl of Carbury, (the friend of JEREMY TAYLOR, q. v.) who appointed him steward of Ludlow Castle. He became united in marriage about this time to a Mrs. Herbert, a lady of fortune, which was lost by unfortunate investments. In 1663 he pub. the 1st part of Hudibras; 2d part, 1664; 3d part, 1678; more was doubtless intended, for the poem is unfinished, and ends abruptly. Three parts, Lon., 1700, and 1710, 1716, 1720, 12mo. With large Annotations, and a preface by Dr. Z. Grey, and plates by Hogarth, Camb., 1744, 2 vols. 8vo, and 1819, 3 vols. 8vo. With an addit. vol. of Notes by Dr. Nash, Lon., 1793, 3 vols. 4to; new edit., illustrated, Lon., 1847, 2 vols. 8vo. Trans. into French by Townley, Lon., 1757, 3 vols. 12mo, and 1819, 3 vols. 12mo, with Notes by Larcher:

"Hudibras has been admirably translated into Voltaire's own language by an English gentleman, (J. Townley,) whose version displays a singular union of spirit and fidelity."

"Scarron is among French writers what Butler is amongst our own."

Dr. Grey's edit. has been highly commended:

"The best critical edition of this author was by Dr. Grey, in 1744; a performance replete with curious, interesting, and accurate historical and bibliographical intelligence. I rarely open this book without rising gratified by its perusal."—Dublin's Literary Companion.

Dr. Nash's edit., illustrated by 60 engraved Portraits, and numerous fine wood-cuts, including the noted frontispiece styled by Dr. Dibdin, "among the miracles of modern art," is a beautiful book:

"The introduction of so many portraits of interesting personages, must give the best recommendation these volumes can obtain to the library of the man of taste."—Lon. Art Union Journal.

Mr. A. Ramsay has also edited an edit. in 1 vol.:

"A careful analysis, with ample extracts; such as may be read with pleasure by the most fastidious."—Lon. Athenæum.

In 1715 appeared what is called The Posthumous Works of Samuel Butler, in 3 vols. 12mo. Of this collection of 50 pieces, three only are genuine. An authentic collection was pub. by Mr. R. Thyer in 1759, 2 vols. 8vo, entitled, Genuine Remains in Prose and Verse, with Notes.

"These remains do not answer my expectations, and as for the editor, he is always in the wrong where there was a possibility of mistaking."—Boswor Warrington.

Perhaps the best of Butler's prose works are the Characters, (vol. 2d.), in the style of Earle, Hall, and Overbury. The best-known of his poetical pieces, after Hudibras, is The Elephant in the Moon, a satire on the Royal Society. It has been generally supposed that Butler spent his last years in great destitution, though this has been denied; but as his friend Mr. Longueville buried him at his own expense, there is little doubt of the truth of this melancholy story. Indeed, Oldham's authority settles the question. It is known that Hudibras was "the chief entertainment of Charles II., who often pleasantly quoted it in conversation," and it is said that his majesty ordered Butler the sum of £3000, but the order being written in figures, somebody, through whose hands it passed, by cutting off a cypher, reduced it to £300. Dr. Johnson remarks, "all that can be told with certainty is, that he was poor."

The general design of Hudibras is borrowed from Don Quixote. Butler's hero is a Presbyterian Justice of the Peace, [Sir Samuel Luke,] who, "in the confidence of legal authority, and the rage of zealous ignorance, ranges the country to repress superstition and current abuses, accompanied by an Independent Clerk, [Squire Ralpho,] disputations and obstinate, with whom he often debates, but never conquers him."

"If inexhaustible wit could give perpetual pleasure, no eye would ever leave halfread the work of Butler: for what poet has ever brought so many remote images so happily together? It is scarcely possible to peruse a page without finding some association of images that was never found before. By the first paragraph the reader is amused, by the next he is delighted, and by a few more strained to astonishment; but astonishment is a tiresome pleasure; he is soon weary of wondering, and longs to be diverted."—Dr. Johnson: Life of Butler.

"Concerning Hudibras there is but one sentiment—it is universally allowed to be the first and last poem of its kind; the learning, wit, and humour, certainly stand unrivalled: various have been the attempts to describe and define the two last. . . . If any one wishes to know what wit and humour are, let him read Hudibras with attention; he will there see them displayed in the brightest colours: there is lustre resulting from the quick elucidation of an object, by a just and unexpected arrangement of it with another subject: propriety of words, and thoughts elegantly adapted to the occasion: objects which possess an affinity or congruity, or sometimes a contrast to each other, assembled with quickness and variety; in short, every ingredient of wit or of humour, which critics have discovered on dissecting them, may be found in this poem."—REV. DR. NASH: Preface to Hudibras.

Sir Walter Scott describes the poetry of Butler as being merely the comedy of that style of composition which Donne and Cowley practised in its more serious form. See Scott's Life of Dryden.

"Hudibras was incomparably more popular than Paradise Lost; no poem in our language rose at once to greater reputation. Nor can this be called ephemeral, like that of most political poetry. For at least half a century after its publication it was generally read, and perpetually quoted. The wit of Butler has still preserved many lines; but Hudibras now attracts comparatively few readers. The eulogies of Johnson seem rather adapted to what he remembered to have been the fame of Butler, than to the feelings of the surrounding generation; and since his time, new sources of amusement have sprung up, and writers of a more intelligible pleasantry have superseded those of the seventeenth century. In the fiction of Hudibras there was never much to divert the reader, and there is still less left at present. But what has been censured as a fault, the length of dialogue, which puts the fiction out of sight, is in fact the source of all the pleasure that the work affords. The sense of Butler is masculine, his wit inexhaustible, and it is supplied from every source of reading and observation. But these sources are often so unknown to the reader that the wit loses its effect through the obscurity of its allusions, and he yields to the base of wit, a peribind, mole-like pedantry. His versification is sometimes spirited, and his rhymes humorous; yet he wants that ease and flow which we require in light poetry."—HALLAM: Introduction to Lit. History.

Mr. Hallam's critique has not itself escaped criticism, but we consider the opinions above quoted as very just. It may be true, as alleged, that to the historical reader the events of the Revolution are generally well known, but even the historian must tax his recollection in reading Hudibras, and there can be little opportunity for amusement when the mind is engaged in coaxing the memory. Hudibras is a work to be studied once, and gleaned occasionally. It may continue neglected, but can never be entirely forgotten.

Butler, Samuel, 1774–1840, a native of Kenilworth, Warwickshire, was educated at Rugby School and St. John's College, Cambridge, where he was highly distinguished for his classical proficiency, obtaining two of Sir William Browne's medals for the Latin odes, and one for the Greek, and being elected Craven scholar in 1793, against Keate, Bethell, and Coleridge. He was elected a Fellow of his College in 1797; appointed head-master of Shrewsbury School, 1798; Bishop of Lichfield, 1836. The bishop pub. a number of works, consisting of classical treatises, sermons, tracts against Priestley, (pub. 1783, '84, '86; 3d edit., 1812,) and several geographical works, which have had large circulation. A new edit. of his Atlas of A. and M. Geography, edited by his son, was pub. in 1853, 2 vols. His most important undertaking was his edit. of Æschylus, for which arduous duty he was specially selected about the time of his appointment to the mastership of Shrewsbury School. This elaborate work was pub. in 4 vols. 4to; also in 6 vols. 8vo, 1806–12. See a list of this worthy and learned prelate's publications in the Gent. Mag., February, 1840. The Bishop's Discourse on Christian Liberty (Shrewsbury, 8vo) has been praised as "An able sermon. This eminent scholar seems to have a clear insight into the free constitution of Christianity. He is equally the enemy of superstition and of intolerance."—Lon. Monthly Repository.

Buxton, Richard. Guide to Flowering Plants near Manchester, Lon., 1849, 12mo.

Buxton, Sir Thomas Fowell, 1786–1845, one of the noblest examples of philanthropic zeal of modern times, was a native of Earl's Colne, Essex; M.P. for Weymouth, 1818–1837; created a baronet, 1840. In conjunction with his sister-in-law, Elizabeth Fry, and his brother-in-law, Mr. Hoare, he personally laboured in the important cause of Prison Discipline. As the successor of William Wilberforce, in his praiseworthy efforts to abolish the Slave Trade, Mr. Buxton's persevering and successful labours are well known. He pub. an Inquiry whether Crime and Misery are Produced or Prevented by our Present System of Prison Discipline, Lon., 1818, 8vo; 4th edit., Edin., 1818, 8vo; and a treatise on the African Slave-Trade, 8vo; several edita.

"In 1840 he was created a baronet,—a dignity to which his public character and large private fortune well entitled him, but which he accepted rather as an acknowledgment of merit rendered valuable by the slanderous attacks which had been made upon him than as an object of personal ambition. No man was more exempt from vanity than Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton: his manners were too plain and his mind was too elevated for such a puerility. Buxton's great merit as a public man consisted in his industry, his energy, and his straightforward honesty of purpose. He never affected display, for he had the good taste to despise it; yet he was always favourably heard, not only because he was the acknowledged head of the religious party, but because his statements were stamped with authority: they were known and felt to be true, and they were put forward with a manner and perspicuity which essentially belong to truth. It was his principle to address himself to the understanding and not to the passions of his audience; and he rarely failed eventually in producing conviction. He was eminently a religious man; and those who knew him privately can testify to the earnestness and humble faith with which he always submitted the event of his important labours with pious resignation to the will of God. He was a faithful and affectionate member of the Church of England: but he was not the man to regard sectarian differences as of importance where he found hand and heart united in zealous effort for the good of mankind. Although he had selected for himself a peculiar path of charity, he was liberal in his support of all benevolent institutions, and particularly of the Bible and Missionary Societies and such as had for their objects the education and improvement of the poor."—*Obituary notice in Lon. "An able and carefully-written treatise, but too concise for the purpose of general reference."—Marvin's Legal Bibl.

Marvin's remark refers to the English edit. of 1843. Moreover, a work of this kind must necessarily be "concise," in order to answer the purpose designed. We quote some notices of the last American edition:

"I have had occasion to look into Byles on Bills and Promissory Notes, with some care, and to examine the Notes of Judge Sharwood. The English work is undoubtedly an excellent one; and is particularly convenient for reference, from its arrangement and condensation. And the notes of American decisions, by Judge Sharwood, display much research and correct judgment on his part, and add greatly to the value of this edition."—R. B. TANEY, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"The law of bills of exchange and promissory notes, everywhere in this trafficking and commercial country, claims much of each practising lawyer's time and learning; and we have heretofore had some excellent treatises from men abundantly able, and wonderfully patient and industrious—as Bayley, Chitty, and Story—but no treatise has commanded so immediate and so continued regard from the bar as Serjeant Byles's. The learned American editor has judged well in annotating a treatise less cumbersome than Chitty, more neat and exact than Story, and more modern than Bayley, and perhaps quite as meritorious. The editorial department leaves little to be desired. The cases have been selected, and arranged, and digested, with a view of aiding and illustrating the principles stated in the text: the work is neither encumbered with copious cases, cheaply borrowed from the digests, nor is it swollen by an amplified discussion of the grounds of the cases familiar to all the practitioners, and to be found in the horn-books of the law."—American Law Register, December, 1853.

This edition has been introduced as a text-book into the law school of Harvard Coll. and the University of Virginia.

Some of his pieces are recorded in Lowndes's Bibl. Manual, and a fuller account will be found in Burney's Hist. of Music. The cele-

Byrde, John, d. 1556, a native of Coventry, educated at Oxf., Bishop of Bangor, 1539; of Chester, 1541. Queen Mary deprived him of his bishopric on account of his being married. He became suffragan to Bishop Bonner, and Vicar of Dunmow, Essex. He was a zealous opponent of the doctrine of the Pope's supremacy, but Strype says that he endeavoured to dissuade the martyr Bilney from becoming a Protestant. He was the author of Lectures on the Epistles of St. Paul; De Fide Justificante, lib. i. Learned Homilies; an Epicode in prose.

"He was a person King Henry VIII. made use of: for in the year 1535, he, with Bishop Fox, the almoner, and Bedel, a clerk of the council, were sent to Queen Catherine, divorced from the king, to forbid the name of queen, which nevertheless she would not do." See Athen. Oxon.

Byrom, John, 1691–1763, a native of Kersall, near Manchester, England, was admitted a pensioner of Trinity College, Cambridge, at the age of 16; took his degree of B. A., 1711. His pastoral of Colin and Phœbe, pub. in the Spectator, No. 603, excited great and deserved admiration.

It is asserted that Phœbe was intended for Joanna, the daughter of the great Bentley, master of Trinity College. This young lady married Bishop Cumberland, and was the mother of the celebrated William Cumberland. Byrom had before contributed to the Spectator two excellent papers on Dreaming, under the name of John Shadow: see Nos. 586 and 593. Byrom was chosen Fellow of his college, and soon after took his degree of Master of Arts. Not designing to take holy orders, he vacated his fellowship, and travelled for some time in France. Returning home, he married his cousin, which displeasing his father and uncle, the young couple were thrown upon their own resources for a livelihood. Byrom now gave lessons in stenography, and pub. two treatises upon the subject, 1767, and Phil. Trans., 1748. (See the Encyclopædias of Rees and Nicholson for an account of Byrom's system.) By the death of a brother he came into possession of the family estate, and spent the rest of his days in the enjoyment of competence. An Epistle to a Gentleman of the Temple, 1749. Enthusiasm; a Poem, 1751. The Contest, [between Blank Verse and Rhyme,] 1755, 8vo. Universal Short Hand, 1767; and Phil. Trans., 1748. Miscellaneous Poems, 1773, 2 vols. 8vo.

"He always found it easier to express his thoughts in verse than in prose. . . . With such an attachment to rhyme, he wrote with ease: it is more to his credit that he wrote in general with correctness, and that his mind was stored with varied imagery and original turns of thought, which he conveys in flowing measure, always delicate, and often harmonious. In his Dialogue on Contentment, and his Poem On the Fall of Man, in answer to Bishop Sherlock, he strongly reminds us of Pope in the celebrated Essay, although in the occasional adoption of quaint conceits he appears to have followed the example of the earlier poets. Of his long pieces, perhaps the best is Enthusiasm, which is distinguished by superior information, and a glow of vigorous fancy suited to the subject."

If the reader be unacquainted with Colin and Phœbe, and wish to realize what the Eastern monarch sighed for in vain—"a new pleasure"—let him or her immediately refer to the Spectator, No. 603, and read this sweet pastoral. Byrom's poems will be found in Johnson and Chalmers's English Poets, 1821, 21 vols. r. 8vo, and his life in Biog. Brit., and Chalmers's Biog. Diet.

Byron, George Anson, Lord, successor to the succeeding, and seventh Lord Byron. A Narrative of the Voyage of his Majesty's Ship Blonde to the Sandwich Islands, in 1824, '25, 4to, with plates.

Byron, George Gordon, Lord, January 22, 1788—April 19, 1824, was the only child of Captain John Byron of the Guards, and Miss Catherine Gordon of Gight, in Aberdeenshire. The celebrated Admiral Byron was grandfather to the subject of our memoir.

"It has been said of Lord Byron that he was prouder of being a descendant of those Byrons who accompanied William the Conqueror into England, than of having been the author of Childe Harold and Manfred."

The name of Ralph de Burun occurs in Doomsday-book among the principal tenants of Nottinghamshire; and his descendants, the Lords of Horestan Castle, held large possessions in Derbyshire and Lancashire. The name of Byron acquired fresh distinction at the siege of Calais under Edward III., and in the fields of Cressy, Bosworth, and Marston Moor. In the reign of Henry VIII., on the dissolution of the monasteries, the church and priory of Newstead, with the lands adjoining, were by royal grant conferred upon "Sir John Byron the Little, with the great beard." At the coronation of James I. his grandson was made a Knight of the Bath, and in the year 1643, (temp. Charles I.), Sir John Byron, "great-grandson of him who succeeded to the rich domains of Newstead," was created Baron Byron of Rochdale, in the county of Lancaster. This honour was well deserved, for

"Sir John Byron, afterward Lord Byron, and all his brothers, bred up in arms and valiant men in their own persons, were all passionately the king's."—Col. Hutchinson's Memoirs.

Col. Hutchinson was cousin-german to Sir Richard Blon, and when the latter advised him to surrender his castle, he returned an answer that "Except he found his own heart prone to such treachery, he might consider there was, if nothing else, so much of a Byron's blood in him, that he should very much scorn to betray or quit a trust he had undertaken."

At the battle of Edgehill there were no less than seven brothers of the Byron family on the field. William, third Lord Byron, succeeded his father, Richard, second Lord Byron, in 1679. About 1750 the shipwreck and sufferings of the Hon. John (afterwards Admiral) Byron, second son of William, fourth Lord Byron, excited the public attention and sympathy. In 1765 the name was brought less creditably into notice, by the trial before the House of Peers, of the fifth Lord Byron, for killing in a duel, or rather, hasty quarrel, his relative, Mr. Chaworth. His lordship was indicted for murder, and only saved from the penalty attendant on manslaughter by pleading his peerage. He passed the rest of his life in seclusion at Newstead Abbey, dying in 1798, when the title and estates of the family were inherited by the subject of our memoir. The admiral's only son, John, became a captain of the Guard. He was conspicuous as one of the handsomest and most dissipated men of his time, and known familiarly as "Mad Jack Byron." In his 27th year he was the cause of a divorce between the Marquis and Marchioness of Carmarthen, and married the lady himself. She survived their union but two years. Their only child was a daughter, Augusta Byron, afterwards the wife of Colonel Leigh. In the year following the death of his first wife, Captain Byron married Miss Catherine Gordon, only child and heiress of George Gordon, Esq., of Gight, in Aberdeenshire. The marriage was one of "convenience" on the part of the groom, and he soon found it convenient to sacrifice her estate to the importunities of his creditors: within two years Miss Gordon's very large property, (the estate alone being sold for £17,850,) with the exception of a trifle, was thus swallowed up. Mrs. Byron's acerbity of disposition has become world-renowned, but we think that her bridal experience should not be omitted when her character is to be weighed. Even a very amiable heiress may be pardoned for a little discomposure of temper, when she finds that she has fallen a prey to a profligate fortune-hunter, who reduces her in a few years from a splendid establishment to £150 per annum! With such an unpromising honeymoon, we need not wonder that the union proved to be such only in name, and in a short time even the name was sacrificed to embittered passions, and "Mad Jack Byron" returned to his bachelor life, only visiting the wretched woman whom he almost beggared, for the purpose of extorting more money from her scanty purse. At his last visit he did not leave Aberdeen until he had succeeded in wringing from her a sufficient sum to defray his expenses to Valenciennes, where in the year following, (1793,) to the relief of his wife in particular, and human nature in general, he terminated his most unprofitable existence. His widow was violently affected at the news of his death, for she never lost her affection for him; and when the young Byron's nurse would meet the Captain in her walks, the deserted and injured, but still loving, wife, would "inquire with the tenderest anxiety as to his health and looks." How common is it to blame this unfortunate woman as the cause of the mental, if not the moral, obliquities of the future poet; but is it not charitable to suppose that such a melancholy reverse of fortune, effected too by such means,—so bitter a disappointment in the object of her affections, who, too, was "unmanly enough to taunt her with the inconveniences of that penury which his own extravagance had occasioned,"—is it not charitable to suppose that health of mind may have been impaired, where the heart had suffered so much?

We will make one concession to the modern apologists for Lord Byron's character: bad as he was, he certainly was a better man than his father.

In 1798 the fifth Lord Byron, his great-uncle, died without issue, and George, then ten years of age, succeeded to the title and estates of his family. He was now placed under the care of the Earl of Carlisle, who had married the sister of the late Lord Byron. The young nobleman was placed at Harrow School, where he was more distinguished for his love of manly sports than for any devotion to study. When 16 years of age he was one of a party assembled at the Hall of Annesley, the residence of the Chaworth family. Miss Chaworth was then eighteen, and a young lady of rare loveliness. Young Byron saw and loved. The affections of the lady were, however, already engaged, and had it been otherwise, the youthful lover seems to have had but a doubtful prospect of success. Byron's admiration had been sufficiently obvious to its object, and, it would appear, to others; for he was doomed to the mortification of hearing her remark—or being informed of the speech by some good-natured friend—"Do you think I could care any thing for that lame boy?" This sarcasm "was like a shot through his heart. Though late at night when he heard it, he instantly darted out of the house, and scarcely knowing whether he ran, never stopped till he found himself at Newstead."—Moore's Life of Byron.

It is a curious fact that neither Lord Byron nor his biographer, Mr. Moore, seems to have been aware that William, third Lord Byron, who (more successful than his kinsman) married, some time before 1679, Elizabeth, daughter of John, Lord Chaworth, was also a poet. See Thomas Shipman's Carolina, or Loyal Poems, 1683, 8vo.

When between sixteen and seventeen, Byron was entered of Trinity College, Cambridge, and here he wasted the hours, which properly employed would have secured to him a solid foundation of learning, in reckless profligacy. He quitted college at nineteen, and took up his residence at the family-seat of Newstead Abbey, and here he prepared for publication a number of his early productions, under the title of Hours of Idleness; A Series of Poems, Original and Translated. By George Gordon, Lord Byron, a Minor, 8vo, pp. 200, Newark, 1807. There was very little in this collection to attract more than passing notice, and notwithstanding some striking stanzas, it would, if the author had written nothing else, have hardly survived its year; but the Edinburgh Review thought a young lord too good a mark to be despised, and they forthwith served him up for the entertainment of a public who had learned to relish their highly-spiced dishes.

"The poetry of this young lord belongs to the class which neither gods nor men are said to permit. Indeed we do not recollect to have seen a quantity of verse with so few deviations from that exact standard. His effusions are spread over a dead flat, and can no more get above or below the level, than if they were so much stagnant water. As an extenuation of this offence, the noble author is peculiarly forward in pleading minority. . . . He possibly means to say, 'See how a minor can write! This poem was actually composed by a young man of eighteen, and this by one of only sixteen!' But, alas, we all remember the poetry of Cowley at ten, and Pope at twelve; and so far from hearing, with any degree of surprise, that very poor verses were written by a youth from his leaving school to his leaving college, inclusive, we really believe this to be the most common of all occurrences; that it happens in the life of nine men in ten who are educated in England; and that the tenth man writes better verse than Lord Byron. . . . We counsel him that he do forthwith abandon poetry, and turn his talents, which are considerable, and his opportunities, which are great, to better account. . . . If then, the following beginning of a 'Song of bards' is by his lordship, we venture to object to it, as far as we can comprehend it. 'What form rises on the roar of clouds, whose dark ghost gleams on the red stream of tempests? His voice rolls on the thunder; 'tis Orin, the brown chief of Oithona. He was,' &c. After detaining this 'brown chief' some time, the bards conclude by giving him their advice to 'raise his fair locks,' then to 'spread them on the arch of the rainbow,' and 'to smile through the tears of the storm.' Of this kind of thing there are no less than nine pages; and we can so far venture an opinion in their favour, that they look very like Macpherson; and we are positive they are pretty nearly as stupid and tiresome. . . . As our author has dedicated so large a part of his volume to immortalise his employments at school and college, we cannot possibly dismiss it without presenting the reader with a specimen of these ingenious effusions. In an ode with a Greek motto, called Granta, we have the following magnificent stanzas:

'There in apartments small and damp,
The candidate for college prizes
Sits poring by the midnight lamp,
Goes late to bed, yet early rises.
Who reads false quantities in Sole,
Or puzzles o'er the deep triangle;
Depriv'd of many wholesome meal,
In barbarous Latin doom'd to wrangle.

Renouncing every pleasing page,
From authors of historic use;
Preferring to the lettered sage
The square of the hypotenuse.

Still harmless are these occupations,
That hurt none but the hapless student,
Compared with other recreations,
Which bring together the imprudent.'

p. 123, 124, 125.

"We are sorry to hear so bad an account of the college psalmody as is contained in the following Attic stanzas:

'Our choir would scarcely be excus'd
Even as a band of raw beginners;
All mercy now must be refus'd
To such a set of croaking sinners.

If David, when his toils were ended,
Had had those blockheads sing before him,
To us his psalms had ne'er descended:
In furious mood he would have tore 'em.'

p. 126, 127.

"But whatever judgment may be passed on the poems of this noble minor, it seems we must take them as we find them, and be content; for they are the last we shall ever have from him. . . . 'It is highly improbable, from his situation and pursuits hereafter,' that he should again condescend to become an author. Therefore, let us take what we get, and be thankful. What right have we poor devils to be nice? We are well off to have got so much from a man of this lord's station, who does not live in a garret, but 'bes the sway' of Newstead Abbey. Again, we say, let us be thankful; and, with honest Sancho, bid God bless the giver, nor look the gift-horse in the mouth."—Edin. Rev., xi. 285.

Doubtless the Reviewer, having thus despatched and quietly inurned his unhappy victim, presumed that the world had heard the last of the author of the Hours of Idleness, in the capacity of poet. The Edinburgh had so long had its own way in the wholesale decapitation of authors, that the poor fellows had "become used to it," and hardly ventured a respectful remonstrance. The critic was mistaken in his man, however. Byron had no idea of tame submission. He affected indifference, indeed:

"You have seen the Edinburgh Review, of course. I regret Mrs. Byron is so much annoyed. For my own part, these 'paper bullets of the brain' have only taught me to stand fire; and as I have been lucky enough upon the whole, my repose and appetite are not discomposed."—Letter to Mr. Becher, March 28, 1808.

But his countenance was a more faithful index of what was passing within:

"A friend, who found him in the first moments of excitement after reading the article, inquired anxiously, whether he had just received a challenge? not knowing how else to account for the fierce defiance of his looks."

He afterwards acknowledged that he essayed to drown his mortification in three bottles of claret after dinner, on the day he perused this terrible critique. Nothing, he said, relieved him.

"Till he had given vent to his indignation in rhyme, and 'after the first twenty lines he felt himself considerably better.'"

It is an evidence of Mrs. Byron's affection for her son, that she seems to have taken this matter as much to heart as did the young author.

In March, 1809, appeared his response to the Edinburgh critics, for such it was in fact, under the title of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. That this pungent satire should have obtained immediate celebrity is no marvel. Men have a natural taste for belligerent demonstrations, and twenty will stop to see a combat, where one will pause to see two friends shake hands. A fresh edition was called for within a few weeks. The authors, long a suffering tribe, rejoiced in their new champion, delighted that the reviewers had found a "foeman worthy of their steel," whilst the public generally, who had before laughed at the victims, were now equally well pleased to laugh at the executioners in the day of their discomfiture. The injustice of many of the attacks in this famed satire was afterwards acknowledged by the author himself. He calls it "a ferocious rhapsody," and "a miserable record of misplaced anger and indiscriminate acrimony." Jeffrey was attacked with the greatest severity; but the author was mistaken in ascribing the critique which displeased him to this quarter, Lord Brougham being really answerable for it. After passing through four editions, his lordship suppressed his satire. In 1809 he concluded to travel on the continent, and left home accompanied by his friend and fellow-collegian, John Cam Hobhouse, who is still living, (1855.) Lord Byron has given us a better idea of his peregrinations in Greece, Turkey, &c., in the pages of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, than any other pen can furnish. He returned home in June, 1811, having been absent for two years. Shortly after his reaching England, his mother was attacked by sickness, which proved fatal before he arrived at Newstead. In 1812 appeared the first two cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage: they were eminently successful:

"The effect was electric; his fame had not to wait for any of the ordinary gradations, but seemed to spring up, like the palace of a fairy tale, in a night. As he himself briefly described it in his Memoranda, 'I awoke one morning and found myself famous.' The first edition of his work was disposed of instantly; and as the echoes of its reputation multiplied on all sides, 'Childe Harold,' and 'Lord Byron' became the theme of every tongue."—Moore's Life of Byron.

The copyright money paid by Mr. Murray, £600, his lordship presented to Mr. Dallas, saying that he never would receive money for his writings, (see Dallas's Recollections), "a resolution," remarks Mr. Moore, perhaps with some allowable esprit du corps, "he afterward wisely abandoned."

Mr. Murray paid at different times, for copyrights of his lordship's poems, certainly over £15,000. A few days before the publication of Childe Harold, he made his first speech in the House of Lords, when he opposed the second reading of the Framework Bill. His second speech was in favour of Catholic Emancipation, and the third was on the 2d of July, 1813, when he addressed the House on presenting Major Cartwright's petition. His lordship was not calculated the "applause of listening senators to command," and did not care to occupy a position where he could never hope to be first. On the 2d of January, 1815, he was married to Miss Anne Isabella, only daughter of Sir Ralph Millbanke, (since Noel,) baronet, who had about a year previously declined his overtures. The £10,000 received with this lady were speedily dissipated, and pecuniary embarrassment aggravated a want of congeniality, which might have been anticipated from the first. Nor did the birth of a daughter, Ada, afterwards Countess of Lovelace, born December 10th, 1815, tend to produce permanent harmony. Lady Byron returned home in January, 1816, with the avowed object of a temporary visit to her family, but she did not see proper to again place herself under his lordship's protection. Perhaps the true causes of this alienation have never wholly transpired, but we learn from her ladyship's explanation, that she had good reason to suspect the sanity of her husband, and did not deem herself justified in remaining under his roof. But, on the other hand, her ladyship has not escaped censure. That there was much affection on the part of the groom at the time of the marriage, we may be allowed to doubt. Shortly before his second proposal, he permitted a friend to offer "his hand and heart" to another lady. She declined, as Miss M. had done.

"You see," said Lord Byron, "that Miss Millbanke is to be the person." He wrote her a letter, repeating his proposition. His friend read it: the language was good, the periods well turned. It was worthy of insertion in the next edition of The Complete Letter Writer. His friend was a judge of fine writing; he commended it warmly:

"This is really a very pretty letter; it is a pity it should not go!" "Then it shall go," replied his lordship. It went: the lady had already satisfied the usual punctilio of her sex by saying "No;" she now satisfied herself by saying "Yes." Is it not strange that even in this day of increased light, there should be simple wooers so unsophisticated as to take what is intended by the lady as the first step to a successful parley—the matter-of-course “No,”—for the conclusion of the treaty? However, the evil will work its own cure. For if men thus persist in thus understanding responses literally, the courted will have to accommodate themselves to circumstances, and say that first which they had intended to say last.

Lord Byron now left England with the avowed intention of never again seeing his native land. He sailed from London for Ostend, April 25, 1816, proceeded to Brussels, and visited the field of Waterloo; then turned his steps towards Coblenz, sailed up the Rhine to Basle, and passed through part of Switzerland to Geneva. There, for the first time, he met with Mr. and Mrs. Shelley. There was much congeniality in their tastes and dispositions, and a warm intimacy sprang up between them. Both were distinguished for extraordinary poetical powers, with an apparent incapacity for logical deduction, a morbid passion for disgraceful notoriety, finding “their glory in their shame,” and, with an insane recklessness, condemning the judgments of that Almighty Ruler, whose precepts they set at naught. Both were men of superficial acquirements, and altogether without profundity of erudition. Yet, shamefully ignorant of the records of the past, they affected to doubt the authenticity of that inspired volume whose evidences they had never probed, and permitted their captious ignorance to quibble and contend where the reverent learning of a Locke and a Newton believed and adored. Yet even Byron was shocked by the profanity of his friend, and seems to have had at times a “certain fearful looking for a judgment to come,” which forbade entire security on the brink of ruin. Whilst at Diodati, near Geneva, he wrote the third canto of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage; to this succeeded The Prisoner of Chillon, A Dream, and other Poems. In October, 1816, he visited Italy, and settled at Venice in November. Of his course of life whilst in this city, we have no disposition to enter into the particulars. It is no pleasant thing to linger over such sad details. Mr. Moore has increased the public censure, before richly merited by some of his own effusions, by the additional sin of apologizing for the shameful conduct of his friend and brother poet. For this reason, and others, an expurgated edition of Moore's Life of Byron is as necessary for the parlour table, as an expurgated edition of his lordship's poems. In 1817 appeared Manfred, a Tragedy, and The Lament of Tasso. In the next year he published the fourth and last canto of Childe Harold, which tended to keep alive the interest felt in the personal experience of the poet. Beppo appeared in the same year, and in the next, (1819,) the tale of Mazeppa, and the first part of Don Juan were given to the public. At an evening party, given by the Countess Benzoni, he became acquainted with the Countess Guiccioli. Teresa Gamba, the daughter of a Romagnese nobleman, had recently been emancipated from the restraints of a convent, and became the wife of a widower in advanced life, who in his younger days had been distinguished as the friend of Alfieri, and in his old age was as much courted for his wealth. At the time of this ill-assorted union, Teresa was only eighteen, very beautiful, and, as appears by the sequel, equally indiscreet. The story of the first evening of their acquaintance can be best told by herself:

“I became acquainted with Lord Byron in the spring of 1819:—he was introduced to me at Venice, by the Countess Benzoni, at one of that lady's parties. This introduction, which had so much influence over the lives of us both, took place contrary to our wishes, and had been permitted by us only from courtesy. For myself, more fatigued than usual that evening on account of the late hours they keep at Venice, I went with great repugnance to this party, and purely in obedience to Count Guiccioli. Lord Byron, too, who was averse to forming new acquaintances—alleging that he had entirely renounced all attachments, and was unwilling any more to expose himself to their consequences—on being requested by the Countess Benzoni to allow himself to be presented to me, refused, and, at last, only assented from a desire to oblige her. His noble and exquisitely beautiful countenance, the tone of his voice, his manners, the thousand enchantments that surrounded him, rendered him so different and so superior a being to any whom I had hitherto seen, that it was impossible he should not have left the most profound impression on me. From that evening, during the whole of my subsequent stay at Venice, we met every day.”

We need only dwell upon this unhappy story long enough to remark, that when Count Guiccioli was, for political reasons, banished from the Tuscan States, and embarked for Genoa, his wife remained under Lord Byron's protection. An application to the Pope severed the legal tie which still bound her to her husband.

In December, 1819, he left Venice, and after visiting some of the Italian dominions of Austria, took up his residence at Ravenna, and subsequently at Pisa. In 1820 he published Marino Faliero, Doge of Venice, intended to illustrate the theory of the dramatic unities. Upon this vexed question we shall hardly be expected to enter. In 1821 he published his celebrated epistle to the Rev. William Lisle Bowles, entitled, A Letter to the Author of Strictures on the Life and Writings of Pope. In the same year appeared The Two Foscari, a Tragedy; Sardanapalus, a Tragedy; and Cain, a Mystery. Perhaps this last is the most shocking exhibition of folly and skepticism of which the author was ever guilty. What folly can be greater than that which arraigns the decrees of infinite wisdom, because unfathomable by man's limited capacities?

In the year following, Byron and Shelley—par nobile fratrum—in conjunction with Mr. Leigh Hunt, commenced the publication of The Liberal, a periodical which was discontinued after the 4th number, owing to the death of Shelley, who was drowned by the upsetting of a pleasure-boat in the Mediterranean. Thus perished one of the most truly original poets that England has ever seen. Had his judgment been equal to his genius, and his passions under proper control, he would have proved a benefactor instead of an injury to his race.

In the Liberal first appeared The Vision of Judgment, (elicited by a work with the same title by Southey,) which subjected the publisher to a prosecution, and a fine of £100. Heaven and Earth, a Mystery, was presented to the public through the same channel. To these latter compositions of his lordship, we have to add the concluding cantos of Don Juan, Werner, a Tragedy, and the Deformed Transformed.

In September, 1822, he quitted Pisa, and passed the winter at Genoa. About this time he received an invitation from the London Committee of Philhellenes, through Mr. Blaquiere, to aid in the deliverance of Greece from the Mohammedan thraldom under which it suffered. As this subject had already enlisted the sympathies of a poet who had long loved Greece for the past, and mourned over her present degradation, the invitation was cordially welcomed:

“I cannot express to you how much I feel interested in the cause, and nothing but the hopes I entertained of witnessing the liberation of Italy itself prevented me long ago from returning to do what I could, as an individual, in that land which it is an honour even to have visited.”—Letter to Mr. Blaquiere, Albaro, April 5, 1823.

On the 14th of July, 1823, he hired an English vessel, and with a few followers sailed from Genoa for Cephalonia, which he reached at the commencement of the third campaign. Finding from his friends, Trelawney and Browne, that Missolonghi was in a state of blockade, he advanced 400,000 piastres (about £12,000) for the relief of the besieged city. On the 5th of January, 1824, he arrived at Missolonghi, and attempted to raise a force with which to attack Lepanto. He took 500 *Suliot*s into his pay, but his expedition was delayed by the disorderly and unsettled temper of his troops. Those whom he would gladly have aided could not agree among themselves, and discordant confusion reigned in their councils. Disappointed and chagrined, his constitution gave way, and on the 15th of February he was attacked by a severe fit of epilepsy. Entreaties were unsuccessfully urged to induce him to remove to the healthier climate of Zante: “I cannot,” he writes to a friend, “quit Greece while there is a chance of my being even of (supposed) utility. There is a stake worth millions such as I am, and while I can stand at all, I must stand by the cause.” Four times within a month the attack was repeated, yet he recovered. But on the 9th of April, being caught in a shower while taking his ride on horseback, a rheumatic fever, accompanied with inflammation of the brain, seized him. This occurred on the 12th inst., and on the 19th he breathed his last. The account of his last moments, as given by Major Parry, Dr. Millinger, and his faithful servant Fletcher, is deeply interesting. He had been charging Fletcher, in the weakness of expiring nature, to carry messages to his sister, to Lady Byron, and others, and

“He then said, ‘Now I have told you all.’ ‘My lord,’ replied Fletcher, ‘I have not understood a word your lordship has been saying.’ ‘Not understand me!’ exclaimed Lord Byron, with a look of the utmost distress. ‘What a pity!—then it is too late; all is over!’ ‘I hope not,’ answered Fletcher, ‘but the Lord's will be done.’ ‘Yes, not mine,’ said Byron. He then tried to utter a few words, of which none were intelligible, except ‘My sister—my child!’ He spoke also of Greece, saying, ‘I have given her my time, my means, my health—and now I give her my life!—what could I do more!’ . . . It was about six o'clock on the evening of this day, when he said, ‘Now I shall go to sleep;’ and then, turning round, he fell into that slumber from which he never awoke.”—Moore's Life of Byron.

An American gentleman, who spent some days with Lord Byron in February, 1824, two months before his decease, has published a very interesting account of their conversations. We give a brief extract:

"I found the poet in a weak, and rather irritable, state, but he treated me with the utmost kindness. He said that at the time I first called upon him, all strangers, and most of his friends, were excluded from his room. 'But,' said he, 'had I known an American was at the door, you should have been denied. I love your country, sir; it is the land of liberty; the only portion of God's green earth not desecrated by tyranny.' . . . In a few days after I left him, I received another note from him, requesting me to call, and bring with me LIVING'S SKETCH BOOK. I took it in my hand, and went once more to the illustrious author's residence. He rose from his couch when I entered, and, pressing my hand warmly, said, 'Have you brought the Sketch Book?' I handed it to him, when, seizing it with enthusiasm, he turned to the 'Broken Heart.' 'That,' said he, 'is one of the finest things ever written on earth, and I want to bear an American read it. But stay! do you know Irving?' I replied that I had never seen him. 'God bless him!' exclaimed Byron; 'he is a genius; and he has something better than genius—a heart. I wish I could see him, but I fear I never shall. Well, read—the "Broken Heart"—yes, the "Broken Heart." What a word!

"In closing the first paragraph, I said, 'Shall I confess it? I believe in broken hearts.' 'Yes,' exclaimed Byron, 'and so do I, and so does everybody but philosophers and fools.' While I was reading one of the most touching portions of that mournful piece, I observed that Byron wept. He turned his eyes upon me, and said, 'You see me weep, sir. Irving himself never wrote that story without weeping; nor can I hear it without tears. I have not wept much in this world, for trouble never brings tears to my eyes; but I always have tears for the "Broken Heart."' When I read the last line of Moore's verses at the close of the piece, Byron said, 'What a being that Tom Moore is, and Irving, and Emmet and his beautiful love! What beings all! Sir, how many such men as Washington Irving are there in America? God don't send many such spirits into this world. I want to go to America for five reasons. I want to see Irving; I want to see your stupendous scenery; I want to see Washington's grave; I want to see the classic form of living freedom; and I want to get your government to recognise Greece as an independent nation. Poor Greece!

"These were the last days of Byron; and I shall always consider myself happy that I was permitted so often to be with him."

The personal appearance of Lord Byron is so well known through the medium of the portraits prefixed to his poems, that any description seems superfluous, and must necessarily be very unsatisfactory.

"Many pictures have been painted of him," says a fair critic of his features, "with various success; but the excessive beauty of his lips escaped every painter and sculptor. In their ceaseless play they represented every emotion, whether pale with anger, curled in disdain, smiling in triumph, or dimpled with archness and love."

His eyes were light, and very expressive, his head remarkably small, the forehead high, and set off to great advantage by his glossy, dark-brown curls. His teeth were white and regular, his nose, though handsomely, rather thickly, shaped, and his complexion colourless. His hands were white, and aristocratically small. In height he was five feet eight inches and a half. The lameness of his right foot, so constant a subject of mortification to him, was in reality so slight, that Mr. Moore tells us he had no little difficulty in deciding, amidst the conflicting testimony of friends, which foot it was that was so affected.

It will now be proper to quote some opinions upon the works of an author, who, whether commended or censured, will always occupy a distinguished rank in the records of English literature:

"If the finest poetry be that which leaves the deepest impression on the minds of its readers—and this is not the worst test of its excellence—Lord Byron, we think, must be allowed to take precedence of all his distinguished contemporaries. He has not the variety of Scott—not the delicacy of Campbell—not the absolute truth of Crabbe—not the sparkling polish of Moore; but in force of diction, and unextinguishable energy of sentiment, he clearly surpasses them all. 'Words that breathe, and thoughts that burn' are not merely the ornaments, but the common staple of his poetry; and he is not inspired or impressive only in some happy passages, but through the whole body and tissue of his composition. . . . He delights too exclusively in the delineation of a certain morbid exaltation of character and of feeling—a sort of demoniac sublimity, not without some traits of the ruined archangel. He is haunted almost perpetually with the image of a being feeding and fed upon by violent passions, and the recollections of the catastrophes they have occasioned. . . . Such is the person with whom we are called upon almost exclusively to sympathise in all the greater productions of this distinguished writer:—in Childe Harold, in the Corair, in Lara, in the Songs of Corinth, in Paradise, and in most of the smaller pieces. It is impossible to represent such a character better than Lord Byron has done in all these productions,—or, indeed, any thing more terrible in its anger, or more attractive in its relenting. In point of effect we readily admit that no one character can be more poetical or more impressive:—But it is really too much to find the scene perpetually filled by one character—not only in all the acts, but in all the different pieces;—and, grand and impressive as it is, we feel at last that these very qualities make some relief more indispensable, and oppress the spirits of ordinary mortals with too deep an impression of awe and repulsion. There is too much guilt, in short, and too much gloom, in the leading character;—and, though it be a fine thing to gaze, now and then, on stormy seas and thunder-shaken mountains, we should prefer passing our days in sheltered valleys, and by the murmur of calm waters. . . . We certainly have no hope of preaching him into philanthropy and cheerfulness; but it is impossible not to mourn over such a catastrophe of such a mind, or to see the prodigal gifts of Nature, Fortune, and Fame thus turned to bitterness, without an oppressive feeling of impatience, mortification, and surprise."—LORD JAMES: Edin. Review, xxvii. 277. Read this elaborate article, in which the merits and demerits of Byron's different poems are reviewed at length.

"The Third Canto of Childe Harold exhibits, in all its strength, and in all its peculiarity, the wild, powerful, and original vein of poetry, which, in the preceding cantos, first fixed the public attention upon the author. If there is any difference, the former seems to us to have been rather more sedulously corrected and revised for publication, and the present work to have been dashed from the author's pen with less regard to the subordinate points of expression and versification. Yet such is the deep and powerful strain of passion, such the original tone and colouring of description, that the want of polish in some of its minute points rather adds to, than deprives, the poem of its energy."—Lon. Quarterly Review, xvi. 172.

"I agree very much in what you say of Childe Harold. Though there is something provoking and insulting to morality and to feeling in his misanthropical egotism, it gives nevertheless an odd piquancy to his descriptions and reflections. This is upon the whole a piece of most extraordinary power, and may rank its author with our first poets. I see the Edinburgh Review has hauled its wind."—Sir Walter Scott to Mr. Morritt, May 12, 1812.

"My intrusion concerns a large debt of gratitude due to your lordship. . . . The first couplet, as our technical language expresses it, relates to the high pleasure I have received from The Pilgrimage of Childe Harold, and from its precursors; the former, with all its classical associations, some of which are lost on so poor a scholar as I am, possesses the additional charm of vivid and animated description, mingled with original sentiment. . . . I hope your lordship intends to give us more of Childe Harold. I was delighted that my friend Jeffrey—for such, in spite of many a feud, literary and political, I always esteem him—has made so handsomely the amende honorable for not having discovered in the bud the merits of the flower; and I am happy to understand that the retraction so handsomely made was received with equal liberality."—Sir Walter Scott to Lord Byron, July 3 and 16, 1812.

Sir Walter gives an interesting account of his first introduction to Lord Byron, which occurred in the spring of 1815:

"I found Lord Byron in the highest degree courteous, and even kind. We met for an hour or two almost daily in Mr. Murray's drawing-room, and found a great deal to say to each other. . . . His reading did not seem to me to have been very extensive, either in poetry or history. Having the advantage of him in that respect, and possessing a good competent share of such reading as is little read, I was sometimes able to put under his eye objects which had for him the interest of novelty." See Lockhart's Life of Scott.

"Never had any writer so vast a command of the whole eloquence of scorn, misanthropy, and despair. That Marah was never dry. No art could sweeten, no draughts could exhaust, its perennial waters of bitterness. Never was there such variety in monotony as that of Byron. From maniac laughter to piercing lamentation, there was not a single note of human anguish of which he was not master. Year after year, and month after month, he continued to repeat that to be wretched is the destiny of all; that to be eminently wretched is the destiny of the eminent; that all the desires by which we are cursed lead alike to misery; if they are not gratified, to the misery of disappointment; if they are gratified, to the misery of satiety. His principal heroes are men who have arrived by different roads at the same goal of despair, who are sick of life, who are at war with society; who are supported in their anguish only by an unquenchable pride, resembling that of Prometheus on the rock, or of Satan in the burning marl; who can master their agonies by the force of their will, and who, to the last, defy the whole power of earth and heaven. He always described himself as a man of the same kind with his favourite creations, as a man whose heart had been withered, whose capacity for happiness was gone, and could not be restored; but whose invincible spirit dared the worst that could befall him here or hereafter. . . . Among that large class of young persons whose reading is almost confined to works of imagination, the popularity of Lord Byron was unbounded. They bought pictures of him, they treasured up the smallest relics of him; they learned his poems by heart, and did their best to write like him, to look like him. Many of them practised at the glass, in the hope of catching the curl of the upper lip, and the scowl of the brow, which appear in some of his portraits. A few discarded their neckcloths in imitation of their great leader. For some years, the Minerva press sent forth no novel without a mysterious, unhappy, Lara-like Peer. The number of hopeful undergraduates and medical students who became things of dark imaginings, on whom the freshness of the heart ceased to fall like dew, whose passions had consumed themselves to dust, and to whom the relief of tears was denied, passes all calculation. This was not the worst. There was created in the minds of many of these enthusiasts, a pernicious and absurd association between intellectual power and moral depravity. From the poetry of Lord Byron they drew up a system of ethics, compounded of misanthropy and voluptuousness: a system in which the two great commandments were to hate your neighbour and to love your neighbour's wife."—LORD MACAULAY: Edin. Review, June, 1831; and in his Crit. and Fictor. Essays, 1854, i. 346, 347, 348.

Lord Byron presented Mr. Moore with his autobiography, and Mr. M. sold the MS. to John Murray for 2000 guineas. Lord Byron's family, after his decease, expressed some unwillingness to have the MS. published. Mr. Moore, with a delicacy worthy of the highest praise, destroyed the papers, and returned Mr. Murray the 2000 guineas purchase-money, with interest. An offer to reimburse the large sum thus cheerfully sacrificed was positively refused by Mr. Moore. From specimens of this autobiography quoted to us by Washington Irving, who inspected the MS., we are perfectly satisfied with the disposition made of the original.

Two of our countrymen—Mr. George Ticknor, author of The History of Spanish Literature, and Mr. Edward Everett, late minister of the United States of America at the Court of St. James—have favoured us with their MS. Recollections of Lord Byron. Mr. Ticknor writes us, (July 22, 1858, "from memoranda made at the time,")

"I became acquainted with Lord Byron in June, 1815, through the kindness of Mr. Gifford, editor of the Quarterly Review, who had a personal regard for the great poet, and to whom alone, as Lord Byron more than once told me, he supposed himself to be indebted for the kindness shown him in that eminently Tory journal. Lord Byron was then living in a large and fine house in Piccadilly. I saw him there only a few times—four in all—during the ten days I was in London after I became acquainted with him; besides which, however, I met him once in Murray's room in Albemarle St., and once passed an evening with him. Lady Byron, and Sir Ralph and Lady Noel, in his private box in Drury Lane Theatre, to see Kean in 'Rule a Wife,'—Lord Byron being then one of the managing-committee of that theatre and an admirer of Kean. The whole of such an acquaintance was necessarily not much, and could give only the most superficial view even of his manners.

"Each time that I saw him at home, Lady Byron was with him, or came into the room while I was there. On these occasions, as well as at the theatre, his manners towards her were very natural and simple, and those of a happy man. He had then been married about six months, and was separated from her about six months afterwards, under circumstances still imperfectly explained to the public, but which were known at the time to Dr. Lushington. His remarkable letter, published at the end of Moore's life, when taken in connection with the pure and elevated character of the eminent magistrate who wrote it to express his deliberate judgment on the whole affair, can leave no reasonable doubt that the separation was made from causes very discreditably to Lord Byron.

"The first time I saw him, I was struck with his movements as he came into the room where I was waiting for him. There was a screen before the door, so that I could not immediately see him; but the sound that came from behind it was as if two or three people were entering together. He advanced towards me rapidly, with his person bent forward, owing, I supposed, to the malformation of his lower limbs, for I noticed the same thing on other occasions. Soon after he sat down he took up one of his feet—which were nicely laced in Wellington boots, and had fashionable white drill pantaloons drawn down over them tight and low—and patted and petted it, as I thought, to see whether I took any special notice of it. I was careful not to do so. I had been warned. But, except in these trifles, I never saw any thing in his manner that was probably the result of his deformity. In all the upper part of his person he was very handsome, round, and full; but his complexion was sallow and pale. His general air was perfectly easy and natural. The tones of his voice were low and conciliating.

"He talked a good deal about America, and was curious on the subject of our universities and literature, inquiring particularly whether we looked upon Barlow as our Homer. Of his own 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' which was then suppressed in England, he said that he wrote it when he was very young and very angry,—adding that those were the only circumstances under which a man would write such a satire. Since he had come back to England, he said that Lord Holland, who had been very kind to him, and Rogers, who had become his friend, had asked him not to continue to reprint it, and so he had suppressed it. Indeed, he went on, he had become of late acquainted with nearly all the persons he had satirized, and had a hearty liking for them, especially as they did not refuse to know a person who had so much abused them. He had no longer any quarrel with any of them except Lord Carlisle: and as that was a family difference, he said he supposed it would never be settled. On every account, therefore, he expressed himself as glad that the book was out of print; and yet he showed no regret when I told him that it was freely circulated in the United States. His poems published during his minority he said he had suppressed because they were not worth reading; and he wondered that our booksellers should reprint them.

"While he was talking in this way, Sir James Bland Burges—a fourth or fifth rate poet who wrote 'The Exodiad' with Cumberland, and a part of whose Epick on Richard the Lion-Hearted Lord Byron, in his 'Hints from Horace,' says he found at Malta lining a trunk—came suddenly into the room, and said, abruptly, 'My lord! my lord! a great battle has been fought in the Low Countries, and Bonaparte is entirely defeated.' 'But is it true?' said Lord Byron; 'is it true?' 'Yes, my lord, it is certainly true. An aid-de-camp arrived in town last night: he has been in Downing Street this morning, and I have just seen him, as he was going to Lady Wellington's. He says he thinks Bonaparte is now in full retreat towards Paris.' After an instant's pause, Lord Byron replied, 'I am d—d sorry for it.' And then, after another slight pause, he added, 'I didn't know but I might live to see Lord Castlereagh's head on a pole; but I suppose I shan't now.' And this was the first impression produced on his impetuous and ill-governed nature by the news of the battle of Waterloo. Two days afterwards I met him at Murray's Rooms, where he received very good-humouredly the satirical congratulations of Gifford and some other of his Tory friends on the great victory; but he did not disguise his feelings or opinions about it, and would not admit that the emperor's case was desperate even then. I was much surprised at all this, though less than I should have been if I had not already heard similar feelings about the whole war of the Hundred Days with Bonaparte expressed by leading Whigs, such as the excellent Mr. Roscoe at Liverpool, who of course spoke more wisely and mildly on the subject, and by Dr. Parr, at Hatton, who was almost as extravagant as Lord Byron.

"A day or two afterwards he sent me a copy of all his works, with letters of introduction for Greece and Turkey,—adding to the one for Ali Pacha a curious pistol, which I subsequently returned, as I went to Spain instead of Greece. Two of the letters I still possess; and I have just observed, by a comparison with notes that I received from Lady Byron twenty years later, that one of them, which is in very nicely-turned French, is in her handwriting.

"On another occasion Lord Byron talked to me of a plan he had once entertained of establishing himself in Greece; and twice he expressed to me his purpose of visiting the United States, saying the first time that he had never envied any men more than he did Lewis and Clarke when he read the account of their travels, and that he had ever since felt the greatest desire to see our Indians. The 'English Bards,' to which he recurred again, he told me he wrote at his place in the country the winter before he went to Greece, at a time when there was a heavy fall of snow on the ground; and he kept house for a month, during which time he never saw the light of day,—rising in the evening after dark, and going to bed in the morning before dawn. 'The Corsair' he said he wrote in eleven days and copied for the press on the twelfth,—adding that whenever he undertook any thing he found it necessary to give himself wholly to it. For this reason he supposed he could never complete Childe Harold, which he began at Yanina and broke off at Smyrna. It was so long since he had laid it aside that he should not, he believed, ever be able to resume it.

"An American copy of his works, in two small and very shabby volumes, printed, I think, at Philadelphia, gave him evident pleasure. He was glad, he said, to see it in so cheap a form that everybody could buy it. It was in boards; and he said he should keep it so, preferring to have it just as it came from America. In this and in other ways he showed that he valued his American reputation, of which he was then just beginning to be aware.

"Above two years after this, in October, 1817, as I was passing from Venice to Ferrara, I stopped at Mira on the Brenta,—the Mira of Dante's Purgatorio,—where Lord Byron was then living. It was eleven o'clock in the forenoon; but he was not up. Fletcher, his body-servant, however, remembered me, and, after taking my card to him, showed me into a room nicely furnished in the English fashion, where I found Mr. Hobhouse (now Lord Broughton) hard at work with learned-looking books, and had some very agreeable talk with him till Lord Byron came down. Contrary to my expectation, he showed no marks of the wild and reckless life he had led since I saw him in London. His countenance was just as fair, smooth, and round as ever. His conversation, however, I thought a little different. Its tone seemed to me to be more lively, various, and decided. As I had been a good deal in Germany, he asked me if I had seen Goethe; and, finding that I had, he put to me many questions about him. He told me that Mr. M. G. Lewis had made him an extemporaneous translation of Faust, reading it to him from German into English,—which accounted to me for a certain resemblance in parts of Manfred to that remarkable poem, which had not then been translated into English and which I was aware he could not read in the original. He was curious, too, to know about Goethe's personal enemies, whose number he had understood to be considerable; and when I gave him an account of a very severe article on Goethe in the Edinburgh Review, which, to his great annoyance, had been translated and published under his nose at Jena by Oken, Lord Byron showed at first an amusing eagerness to hear all about it, but then, seeming to check himself, said, as if half in earnest though still laughing, 'And yet I don't know what sympathy I can have with Goethe except that of an injured author.' And this, I think, was the exact truth; for he left on my mind that morning no doubt that he felt himself to be undervalued as a poet in England.

"Both he and Mr. Hobhouse spoke with great satisfaction of their residence in Italy,—Lord Byron, with my surprise, placing its attractions much higher than those of Greece. It will be remembered that he had then written, but had not printed, the fourth canto of Childe Harold; and Mr. Hobhouse, I have always supposed, was, when I entered the parlour at Mira, at work on the notes to it, which he published soon afterwards."

Mr. Everett writes us, (August 3, 1858),

"Having at a very early age begun to feel a great interest in modern Greece, that feeling was raised to enthusiasm by the two first cantos of Childe Harold, which appeared the year after I left college. Determined to visit Greece myself, I felt on that account especially desirous, on my arrival in London in the spring of 1818, of making the acquaintance of Lord Byron. I was offered an introduction to him by more than one friend,—particularly by Richard Sharpe, Esq., better known in society as 'Conversation Sharpe.' Delays, however, took place, and my youthful impatience led me somewhat to overstep the bounds of strict propriety. I addressed a note to Lord Byron, sending with it a copy of a poetical trifle privately printed by me some time before, in which he was mentioned, and asking the honor of his acquaintance. I received a most obliging answer from him the next day, accompanied with a set of his poems in four volumes, (rendered doubly valuable by marginal corrections in his handwriting,) and appointing an hour when he would see me. His reception of me was most cordial. Intercourse between the two countries was just reopened after the war of 1812-1814, and I was the first person from the United States whose acquaintance he had made. He expressed high satisfaction at the account I gave him of his transatlantic fame. Our conversation was principally on the state of education and literature in this country, and on Greece, to which he said he was so much attached that but for family considerations he should be disposed to pass his life there. He offered me, without solicitation on my part, letters to his friends there, and, among them, to Ali Pacha of Albania.

"The state of public affairs was then very critical. Napoleon, recently escaped from Elba, was advancing rapidly to meet the Prussian and English armies in Belgium. The probable result of the impending conflict was discussed with warmth by Lord Byron. 'Napoleon,' said he, 'will at first, no doubt, drive the Duke of Wellington. That I shall be sorry for: I don't want to have my countrymen beaten. But I will tell you what I do want. I want to see Lord Castlereagh's head carried on a pike beneath that window.' This feeling, violent as it is, seems to have been pretty deliberately cherished by Lord Byron. It is expressed in his conversation with Mr. Ticknor a few days later, after the battle of Waterloo had been fought; and in a letter to Moore written a day or two before I saw Lord B. he says, 'Of politics we have nothing but the yell for war; and Castlereagh is preparing his head for the pike, on which we shall see it carried before he has done.'

"Lord Byron—at this time in the enjoyment of his reputation as the chief of the modern British Parnassus—had laid aside entirely the misanthropic tone and eccentric manners with which he returned from the East. He was a great favorite in society, and happy, to all appearance, at home. He had also formed friendly relations with many of those whom he had attacked most fiercely in 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.' Mr. Rogers gave me an amusing account of the commencement of his acquaintance with Lord Byron on his return from the East. It took place in connection with the reconciliation of Byron and Moore, of which the successive steps are minutely related in Moore's Life of Byron. Mr. Rogers, having been informed by Moore that Byron and he had agreed on a meeting as friends, proposed that it should be at his (Mr. Rogers's) house, and desired Moore to invite Byron to meet him at dinner there. This invitation was accepted in the most gracious manner by Byron. It was intended at first that the party should be confined to the trio; but Campbell happened to call on Mr. Rogers in the course of the morning, and was invited to join them. This was in the first week of November, 1811; and at that time Byron was not personally known to Rogers, Moore, or Campbell! Mr. Rogers introduced himself to Lord Byron, and presented the other two as they arrived. Mr. Rogers—whose dinners were always perfect—had taken pains to have a particularly nice one that day. He soon found, however, somewhat to his consternation, that there was nothing on the table which Lord Byron could eat or drink. He was at that time in one of the frequent fits of abstinence which he practised to check a tendency to grow stout. After refusing every thing on the table, he asked for hard biscuit and soda-water, neither of which happened to be in the house. The soda-water was sent for and procured, but the biscuit was not to be had in the neighborhood. Lord Byron then called for the potatoes, filled his plate with them, and, pouring the contents of the vinegar-cruet over them, made a hearty meal. His manner and conversation on this occasion did not appear to have pleased Mr. Rogers so much as they did Mr. Moore. Whenever I saw Lord Byron, his deportment and conversation were those of a well-bred, intelligent man of the world, wholly free from affectation and eccentricity.

"It has been a question whether Lord Byron was lame in one foot or both. My own impression, when I saw him, was that the deformity extended equally to both feet; and such I understand Mr. Trevelyan, speaking from actual inspection after death, declares to have been the case. It was concealed from the eye by very long and loose trousers, but caused him to walk with a slight jerk at the hip. Mr. Rogers and Lord Byron were leaving a party together, shortly after his return from the Continent. A linkman accosted Lord B. by name. Mr. Rogers heedlessly said, 'You see everybody knows you already.' Lord Byron rejoined, with a bitter expression, 'Yes; I am deformed.' This feeling seems to have been habitually present to his mind, if we can trust his biographers; but on no occasion when I saw him did his countenance wear the expression of gloom or care.

"Three years and a half after I saw him in London, I had an opportunity of renewing my acquaintance with Lord Byron at Venice, where I saw him a few times in the autumn of 1818. Notwithstanding the events which had occurred since I saw him in London, there was no change in his general appearance and manner. Our conversation was again very much on Greece, which I was to visit the next spring and for which he furnished me additional letters. He now spoke with some confidence of taking up his abode there, though the revolution which caused him to do so had not yet broken out. He dwelt at some length on the state of society in Italy, particularly in Venice, and especially on the circle at the Countess Albrizzi's, which Lord B. attended every evening for two years, to which I had the good fortune to be introduced by Ugo Foscolo. He spoke also with a good deal of interest of the Armenian studies which he carried on for a short time under Father Pascal Auger, of the Armenian Convent at Venice. This learned and amiable ecclesiastic, whom I had the pleasure of knowing, told me that for the short time that Lord Byron studied with him he made rapid progress. He translated into English Father Ancher's Armeno-Italian grammar, and also the unauthentic Epistles of Paul to the Corinthians, which had never appeared in an English version. They are found, as translated by Lord Byron, in the Appendix to Moore's Life.

"It is scarcely necessary to add that Lord Byron's letters to his friends in Corfu, Albania, and Greece Proper were of the greatest service to me, especially at the court of Ali Pacha. 'Dark Muctar, his son,' so well known to the readers of Childe Harold, was the first person of eminence whom I saw at Yanina, of which he was then the governor."

Byron, Hon. John, 1723-1786, a distinguished British admiral and circumnavigator, was the grandfather of Lord Byron, the celebrated poet, and son of William, fourth Lord Byron, and Frances, daughter of William, Lord Berkeley, of Stratton. His Life will be found in Charnock's Biographia Navalis, Lon., 1794-96, 6 vols. 8vo, and other collections. Lord Byron, the poet, relating an instance of the troubles often encountered by those who brave the "perils of the deep," thus reverentially refers to the hardships endured by his respected ancestor:

"—His sufferings were comparative,
To those related in my grand-dad's narrative."

Cadwallader, Thomas, M.D., d. 1779, aged 72, was one of the physicians of the Pennsylvania Hospital from 1752 until his decease. His dissections for Dr. Shippen were among the earliest made in this country. He was noted for his great courtesy of manner, which was once the means of saving his life. The story is as follows:

"A provincial officer, weary with his life, had determined to shoot the first person whom he should meet, in order that justice should bring him to the gallows. An easier method of reaching his end would have been to shoot himself. However, with his resolution and his gun he sallied forth. He first met a pretty girl; but her beauty vanquished his intent. He next met Dr. Cadwallader, whose courteous 'Good morning, sir, what sport?' also conquered him. He then went to a tavern, and shot a Mr. Scull, for which he was hanged." See Ramsay's Rev.; Thacher's Med. Blog.; Allen's Dict.

He pub. a Dissertation on the Iliac Passion, entitled, An Essay on the West India Dry Gripes, 1745, in which he recommended the use of opiates and mild cathartics, instead of quicksilver, then employed. This was one of the earliest American medical treatises. Boylston, Harwood, and Thacher had previously pub. medical treatises.

Cædmon, d. about 680, the father of English Song, is first mentioned by Bede, who gives us to understand that he occupied, at least occasionally, the humble post of a cow-herd. He was so ignorant as to be unable to bear his part in the alternate vocal music with which our Saxon forefathers recreated themselves at their feasts. Cædmon, it is related, was supernaturally inspired with the gift of song whilst asleep in his stable; and the Abbess Hilda considered herself honoured by his consenting to become a monk in her house. Bede informs us that he celebrated in magnificent strains much of the Old and New Testament's history, the "terrors of the day of judgment, the pains of hell, and the sweetness of the heavenly kingdom." Junius pub. in 1655 a MS. supposed to contain some of the poetry of this distinguished bard. A new edit., edited by the eminent Saxon scholar, Rev. Benjamin Thorpe, was pub. by the Society of Antiquaries of London, in 1832, consisting of a text formed carefully from the original MS., and accompanied by a literal English version; and illustrated by a volume of plates taken from the illuminations of the MS. This work is commended to the careful attention of the reader.

"An excellent and satisfactory edition, with a most valuable Index."—KEMBLE.

The striking resemblance between Cædmon's account of the Fall of Man, &c., and portions of Milton's Paradise Lost, has been frequently noticed.

"The pride, rebellion, and punishment of Satan and his princes, have a resemblance to Milton so remarkable, that most of his portion might be almost literally translated by a cento of lines from the great poet."—*W. Antient State, Authority, and Proceedings of the Court of Requests, 1596, '97, 4to. Many of the valuable MSS. collected by him are in the British Museum. Fuller gives this high character of him:

"A person of prodigious bounty to all of worth or want, so that he might seem to be almoner-general of the nation. The story is well known of a gentleman, who once borrowing his coach, (which was as well known to poor people as any hospital in England,) was so rendezvoused about with beggars in London, that it cost him all the money in his purse to satisfy their importunity, so that he might have hired twenty coaches on the same terms. Sir Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, was judicious in his election, when, perceiving his dissolution to approach, he made his last bed in effect in the house of Sir Julius."—Worthies of Middlesex.

Caius, John, Poet Laureate to Edward IV., trans. The History of the Siege of Rhodes.

Caius, Kaye, Key, or Cay, John, 1510-1573, an eminent English physician, was a native of Norwich, and in 1529 was entered of Gonvil Hall, Cambridge, to which he gave a large sum to build a new (now known as Caius) College. (See Biog. Brit.) Hippocratis de Medicamentis, De Medendi Methodo, &c., Basil, 1544, 8vo. Treatises on the Sweating Sickness, 1552, &c. The best description extant. He calls it a "contagious pestilential fever of one day," and describes it as prevailing "with a mighty slaughter, and the destruction of it as tremendous as the plague of Athens." By request of Gesner, he wrote a treatise on British Dogs: De Canibus Britannicis, Liber unus, &c., 1570, (&c., 8vo.), inserted entire in the British Zoology of Pennant, who has followed his arrangement. Of other works written by Caius, one of the principal is De Antiquitate Cantabrigiensi Academiæ, Libri duo. Adunximus Apportionem Antiquitatis Oxoniensis Academiæ: ab Oxoniensi quodam, Lon., 1568, 12mo. The origin of this work was as follows: Thomas Caius of Oxford had written in 1566, a treatise, Assertio antiquitatis Oxoniensis Academiæ, in which he affirmed that Oxford was the most ancient University, being founded by some Greek philosophers, the companions of Brutus, and restored by King Alfred in 870. It is said that Archbishop Parker sent a copy of this treatise to John Caius of Cambridge, our author, and requested him to vindicate his University. It was a labour of love with the valiant Cambridge man, who wrote the above-named dissertation, which he pub. with the Oxford champion's treatise. John Caius does not stop at trifles, for so far is he from yielding the point, that he undertakes to prove that Cambridge was founded by Cantaber, 397 years before Christ, and consequently was 1267 years older than Oxford! Thomas Caius, nothing daunted, wrote a critique upon his adversary's arguments. We commend this subject to antiquaries who now adorn the halls of Oxford and Cambridge. John Caius pub. a list of his works in De Libris Propriis, Liber unus, 1570. He was one of the best Grecians of his day.

Caius, Thomas, d. 1572, educated at, and Fellow of, All Souls' College, Oxford, afterwards Prebendary of Sarum, and master of University College, has been noticed under the preceding article. Assertio Antiquitatis Oxoniensis Academiæ, Lon., 1568, 12mo; 1574, 4to. Vindicat Antiquitatis Oxoniensis, contra Joannem Caium Cantabrigiensem. In lucem ex Autographo emisit, Tho. "No piece of its kind or size gained more credit to its author, or was more taken notice of by the public."

Thomas De Laune wrote against it in such a manner as to cause his imprisonment.

"As a divine, Benjamin Calamy has been mentioned with high approbation by Bishop Burnet, Archdeacon Echard, Dean Sherlock, who preached his funeral sermon, wherein he speaks of him in the highest terms, and Mr. Granger."

"As a sermon writer he is characterized by constant good sense, by sound judgment in the selection of his subjects, simplicity in his plans, and ease, clearness, and purity of style."—British Pulpit Eloquence.

Calamy, Edmund, 1600-1666, a native of London, was admitted of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1616; made Vicar of St. Mary's, in Swaffham Prior, Cambridgeshire, which he resigned upon being appointed one of the lecturers of Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk. Withdrawing from the Established Church, he was, in 1639, chosen minister of St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, where he continued for twenty years, attracting attention by his eloquence in the pulpit. He was a warm advocate of the Restoration, and Charles II. on his return offered him the Bishopric of Lichfield and Coventry, which he declined. He afterwards fell into disgrace with the government in consequence of the freedom of his remarks. Calamy was one of the five authors of Smectymnus, an answer to Bishop Hall's Divine Right of Episcopacy. He pub. a number of sermons, &c., 1641-63. Calhoun, John Caldwell, 1782-1850, a distinguished American statesman, was born in Abbeville district, South Carolina, on the 18th of March. During "a period of forty years he rendered faithful services to the Union in the various capacities of Representative, Secretary of War, Vice-President, and Senator." He died at Washington City on the 31st of March, 1850.

"Few men have been called upon to pass through scenes of higher political excitement, and to encounter more vigorous and unrelenting opposition than Mr. Calhoun; yet, amid all the prejudices which party feeling engenders, and all the jealousy of political rivals, and all the animosity of political opponents, no one has ever ventured to hazard his own reputation for judgment or sincerity so far as to doubt one moment his great and commanding talents."

Works, edited by Richard K. Cralle, New York, 1853-54, &c., 6 vols. 8vo.

We annex some notices of Mr. Calhoun's Essay on Government, (vol. i. of his works,) to which he devoted the careful attention of many of his leisure hours:

"If we were called upon to select any one portion of the Treatise for quotation, we should be at great difficulty to separate, where all is so closely connected. The history of parties in our Union, the profound speculations on the dangers attending our future destinies and their remedies, the account of the formation of our Colonial Governments, and of our federative system, and the demonstration that this is a federal, and not a national, government, are alike admirable. No piece of reasoning can be more conclusive than this vindication of the doctrine of State sovereignty. Every truth has more to fear from its half-way friends than its avowed enemies. Few persons venture to deny that the states are sovereign, but their federalism is hidden even to themselves, under the sophism of a divided sovereignty. They contend that our system is partly federal and partly national, and imagine that both the several States and the Union are sovereign. To expose this fallacy it is necessary to have a just conception of sovereignty. Mr. Calhoun's philosophical habits of thought kept this ever present to his mind. . . . Our free quotations have afforded to the reader some opportunity of judging of Mr. Calhoun's style. It has none of that curious fidelity which makes some books pleasant reading, apart from the value of the ideas. There is less of that magnificent imagery which adorns Burke's thoughts, without encumbering them, and illuminates the reason with the splendour of the imagination; though occasionally images of great brilliancy flash, with meteor-like swiftness, across the path of Calhoun's discourse. The rhythm of his style seems rugged, when read in an ordinary tone; but give it the earnest emphasis which marked his manner of speaking, and its march beats time to its meaning."—Southern Quarterly Review, vol. vii., New Series, 378, April, 1853.

"We return to this volume, however, only for the purpose of taking leave of it with an expression of sincere respect for the frankness and ability with which it is written, and for the honesty of the author's purposes, however we may dissent from many of his opinions."—North Amer. Review, vol. lxxvi. 507, April, 1853.

"The eloquence of Mr. Calhoun, or the manner in which he exhibited his sentiments in public bodies, was part of his intellectual character. It grew out of the qualities of his mind. It was plain, strong, terse, condensed, concise; sometimes impassioned, still always severe. Rejecting ornament, not often seeking far for illustrations, his power consisted in the plainness of his propositions, in the closeness of his logic, and in the earnestness and energy of his manner."—HON. Callanan, James Joseph, Irish poet, b. at Cork, 1795, d. at Lisbon, 1829, partly educated at Maynooth College for the Roman Catholic priesthood. He subsequently entered Trinity College, Dublin, with a view of becoming a barrister, and there produced two Prize Poems,—one on the Accession of George IV., the other on the Restoration by Alexander the Great of the Spoils of Athens. Suddenly abandoning the University and the study of the law, the remainder of his life in Ireland was spent in the duties of tutorship, partly in private families and partly in the school kept at Cork by the celebrated Dr. William Maginn. Encouraged by this great scholar, Callanan translated a series of six Irish Popular Songs, which appeared in 1823 in vol. xiii. of Blackwood's Magazine. Between this time and 1827, when he quitted Ireland for Lisbon, Callanan wrote numerous poems, of which the most ambitious was "The Recluse of Inchidony," in the Spenserian stanza. His most successful pieces were lyrical. The best are "The Virgin Mary's Bank," and the spirited ballad-ode called "Gousane Barra," commencing

"There is a green island in lone Gousane Barra, Where Allua of songs rushes forth as an arrow,"—
the most perfect, perhaps, of all Irish minor poems in the melody of its rhythm, the flow of its language, and the weird force of its expression. Mr. Callanan died as he was about returning to Ireland. A small 12mo volume of his Poems was published at Cork almost simultaneously with his death. A new edition, with a Memoir,—chiefly an expansion of an article in Bolster's Quarterly Magazine of Ireland,—appeared in 1847, and a 3d edition, edited by M. F. McCarthy, author of the Memoir, was issued in 1848.

Camden, William, 1551-1623, "The British Pausanias," was a native of London, a son of Sampson Camden, a house-painter, who had removed from Lichfield to the metropolis. His mother was of the ancient family of the Curwens of Workington, in Cumberland. He received the rudiments of education in Christ's Hospital and St. Paul's school, and in his 15th year was admitted a servitor in Magdalen College, Oxford. Failing to obtain a demi's place here, he removed to Broadgate's Hall, now Pembroke College. He was unsuccessful as a candidate for a Fellowship in All Souls' College, and in 1570 failed in obtaining the degree of A.B. This, however, was conferred upon him in 1573. In 1575 he was appointed second master of Westminster school, and in 1593 was advanced to the post of head master. From the troublesome, though honourable, duties pertaining to this office he was relieved in 1597, when, by the interest of Sir Fulke Greville, he was appointed to the office of Clarendieu King-at-Arms. He was now enabled to pursue those antiquarian pursuits—by extensive peregrination through England and diligent study of records—the results of which have conferred so much celebrity upon his name. After ten years of indefatigable industry he pub. 1588, in Latin, 8vo, the first edition of the Britannia. The title retained in all the editions was as follows: Britannia, sive Florentissimorum Regnorum Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ, et Insulatum adjacentium, ex intima Antiquitate, Chorographica Descriptio, 2d edit., 1587, 12mo; 3d, 1590; 4th, 1594, 4to; 5th, 1600; 6th and last edit., corrected by the author, 1607, fol.; the 1st edit. with Maps. As the work passed from one edition to another, enlargements, corrections, and improvements were made. The 4th edit., 1594, was attacked by Ralph Brooke, who was answered in the Apology to the Reader in the 5th edit. Brooke again took up the cudgels;—but of this controversy we have already treated under Ralph Brooke. In 1610 the Britannia was trans. by Philemon Holland, who is supposed to have consulted the author, which impression confers great credit upon this version. The best edit. is that of 1637, fol. In 1695 Bishop Gibson trans. The Britannia into English, with large additions at the end of each county and Holland's most material notes at the bottom of each page. The names of Bishop Gibson's coadjutors in this labour will be found in the Censura Literaria. This trans. was reprinted in 1753, 2 vols. fol., and again in 1772, 2 vols. fol., with some corrections and improvements from his lordship's MS. in his own copy. A first vol. of a trans. by William Oldys was printed in 4to, but Mr. Gough thinks was never finished nor dated. The last and most complete trans. of this great work was pub. in 1789, (enlarged,) 3 vols. fol., by Richard Gough, an antiquary of great learning. Mr. Gough superintended the first vol. of a new edit., but in 1806 declined proceeding with his labours. He announced this determination to the papers, that no improper use might be made of his name. The work, however, was completed in 4 vols. fol., 1806, and is sold for about the same price as the other impression, say £7. Dr. Bliss suggests that the University of Oxford, to which Gough bequeathed his collections relating to British Topography, should pub. a new edit. of the Britannia. Lirizæus pub. a Latin abridgment of the original work, 1617, 12mo; 2d edit., 1639, 12mo; Amst., 1648, fol. An edit. by Bleau in French, with maps engraved by Speed, was pub., Amst., 1662, fol. An abridgt. of the original by Charles Blackwell appeared, Lon., 1701, 2 vols. 8vo; with addit., 1728, 2 vols. fol.

The value of the Britannia can hardly be over-rated: "The glory of this queen's reign, as well as her successor's, and the prince of our English antiquaries, was Mr. Camden, whose life has been written at large by Dr. Smith, Mr. Wood, and Dr. Gibson. So that I need not here mention any of its particulars. His Britannia is the book which chiefly respects the subject of this chapter; and may honestly be stilled the common sun, whereas our modern writers have all lighted their little torches."—BISHOP NICOLSON: English Hist. Library, chap. I.

The work, even in its first and imperfect edition, was declared to be "an honour to its author, and the glory of his country." He was encouraged by that which was of more value than mere public commendation—the applause of the learned in matters of antiquarian research. We give a specimen:

"I thank you most heartily, good Mr. Camden, for the use of these books of yours, since they deliver many things that are not, so far as I do know, elsewhere to be had, and the same no less learnedly picked out than delicately uttered and written."—Letter from William Lambard, the famous Kentish antiquary, July 9, 1586.

"Hearne in one of his MS. Diaries in the Bodleian, (vol. lxx. pp. 116, 116,) says, 'There is in the Ashmolean Museum amongst Mr. Ashmole's books, a very fair folio Manuscript, handsomely bound, containing an English translation of Mr. Camden's Britannia by Richard Knolles, the same that writ the History of the Turks. This book was found lock'd up in a box, in Mr. Camden's study, after his death. Mr. Camden set a great value upon it. I suppose it was presented by the author to Mr. Camden.' This volume is now the MS. Ashmole, 849."

We quote an account of a most desirable copy advertised lately by Mr. Geo. Willis, London:

Camden's Britannia, translated and enlarged by Gough and Nichols. Last edition, illustrated with about 3000 additional portraits, engravings, maps, &c., in 15 vols. royal fol., uncut, £16 16s., 1806.

"A valuable and very extensive collection of Portraits and Plates, to illustrate this work, collected from the antiquarian publications of Pennant, J. T. Smith, S. R. Meyrick, Views of Antiquities, Castles, Abbeys, Churches, &c., by Sandby, Storer, Greig, Allom, &c. Portraits by Vertue, Lambert, Lely, (including Richardson's Collection,) Cuttings and Selections from topographical and historical works, &c."

In 1597 he pub. his Greek Grammar for the use of Westminster school, which when D. Smith pub. his life, in 1691, had gone through forty impressions. It was superseded at Westminster about 1650, by Busby's Grammar. In 1600 he gave to the world a description of the monuments in Westminster Abbey—Reges Regine Nobiles, etc.; reprinted with additions in 1603 and 1606, 4to. In 1603 appeared his collection of Historians—Asser, Walsingham, De la More, Cambrensis, &c., Franck., fol. From these writers he had intended to compile a civil history of Great Britain, but abandoned the project. The article "Norman" is a part of the proposed work. In 1605 he pub. Remaines of a greater work concerning Britain, &c., fol.; and 1614, 1627, 1629, 1635, 4to; 6th edit. enlarged by Sir John Phillipot and W. D., 1637, 4to; 7th edit., 1674, 8vo. This is a collection of fragments illustrative of the habits, manners, and customs of the ancient Britons and Saxons. At the desire of James I. he drew up, in Latin, an account of the Gunpowder plot,—Actio in Henricum Garnetum Societatis Jesuiticæ, etc., 1607, 4to.

"Performed with great accuracy, elegance, and spirit." It was immediately condemned by the Inquisition. His attached friend and patron, Lord Burleigh, had in 1597, a year before his death, urged Camden to compile a history of the reign of Elizabeth. His lordship had carefully noted the events and actors of the time, and his information and literary records were of invaluable assistance to the historian. Camden completed the first part of his task, extending to 1589, in 1615, when it was pub. under the title of Annales rerum Anglicarum et Hibernicarum regnante Elizabethâ ad an. salutis, 1589, fol. We can readily imagine the difficulty under which a historian laboured who could only publish his MS. after inspection by one occupying the position to Mary of Scotland and Elizabeth of England which was held by James I. The royal warrant for the publication of part first empowered Camden to publish "so much of the History of England in Latin as we have perused," &c.

"Some objections were made with respect to the account he has given of the unfortunate Mary, Queen of Scots, as if he had been biased therein, from a complaisance for her son, who was his sovereign; but there does not appear any just ground for these suggestions: much less for what has been asserted, that his work was altered or castrated, and that it did not appear to the world as it fell originally from his pen."—Biog. Brit.

However innocent Camden may have felt of cause for any just censure, he doubtless was conscious that he was placed in a position which no historian should occupy; and that he had erred in publishing his work under such circumstances. He intrusted a copy of the original MS. of the second portion to his friend Mr. Dupuy, who was ordered to publish it after the historian's decease. The trust was discharged. It was first printed at Leyden, 1625, 8vo; and again at London, 1627, fol.; Leyden, 1639, 8vo; an English trans. by Thomas Brown, Lon., 1628, 4to; in English, 1635, fol.; Latin, Lugd. Bat., 1639, 8vo; London, 1675, fol.; the same, Amst., 1677, 8vo; in English, Lon., 1688, fol.; best edit., by Hearne, from Dr. Smith's copy, corrected by Camden's own hand, collated with a MS. in Rawlinson's library, Oxf., 1717, 3 vols. 8vo; and see Kennet's Collection, ii., 1706.

"The method is clear and plain, judiciously laid down, and constantly pursued, with equal accuracy, skill, and attention. The style is grave, and suited to the majesty of the history, never swelling into a false sublime, or sinking even in the relation of the smallest circumstances, but even and elegant throughout, free from any mixture of affectation, and from a vain and needless ostentation of learning: no way deficient in necessary circumstances, never loaded with tedious or trifling particularities, but proceeding in so just and equal a manner that the attention of the reader is continually retained, and never embarrassed by any ambiguity or doubtfulness of expression."—Biog. Brit.

"A most exquisite history."—BISHOP NICOLSON: English Hist. Library.

Camden's Annals of Elizabeth and Bacon's Hist. of Henry VII. are the only two Lives of the Sovereigns of England which come up to the dignity of the subject, either in fulness of matter or beauty of composition."—Selden.

The reader will be pleased to know the opinion of Mr. Hume:

"Camden's History of Queen Elizabeth may be esteemed good composition, both for style and matter. It is written with simplicity of expression, very rare in that age, and with a regard to truth. It would best, perhaps, be too much to affirm that it is among the best historical productions which have yet been composed by any Englishman. It is well known that the English have not much excelled in that kind of literature."—Hist. of Eng.

Dr. Robertson protests against Camden's version of Scottish affairs under Queen Mary as more inaccurate than any which has come down to us. Doubtless the historian was placed in circumstances calculated to cause him to favour the character of Elizabeth. Annales Jacobi Reges, 1603–23, Lon., 1691, 4to; in English, see Kennet's Collection. Ipsius et illustrium Virorum, &c., Lon., 1691, 4to. Camden also wrote some poems, epitaphs, and antiquarian essays. Vide Hearne's Collection, &c. The name of Camden is, undoubtedly, one of the most distinguished which adorns the English annals.

"The high reputation his writings acquired him amongst sovereigns, is, at the same time, a tribute to his merit, and to the glory of this nation, which owes to few of her worthies in the Republic of Letters more than to him, whose fame extended throughout Europe, and yet escaped the rage of critics wherever it came. This was certainly owing, in a great measure, to the sweetness and candour of his temper, which so qualified his learning, that in foreign nations all were ready to commend, and none cared to dispute with him."—Biog. Brit.

"In his writings he was candid and modest, in his conversation easy and innocent, and in his whole life even and exemplary."—BISHOP GISSON. See Life in Gough's Camden; Biog. Brit.; Life by Smith; Athen. Oxon.

"The most learned man Scotland ever produced."—BISHOP HALL.

Such extravagance is in bad taste: who is to decide who is the most learned man in any country, in any age? The terms so current, of the most learned, or most polite, or the best, or the wittiest, or the greatest, man, or the handsomest woman—and, indeed, all superlatives—are shocking vulgarisms, which cannot be too carefully eschewed.

"There is, indeed, in Lord Campbell's works much instruction; his subjects have been so happily selected, that it was scarcely possible that there should not be. An eminent lawyer and statesman could not write the lives of great statesmen and lawyers without interweaving curious information, and suggesting valuable principles of judgment, and useful practical maxims; but it is not for these that his works will be read. Their principal merit is their easy, animated flow of interesting narrative. No one possesses better than Lord Campbell the art of telling a story; of passing over what is commonplace; of merely suggesting what may be inferred; of explaining what is obscure, and of placing in strong light the details of what is interesting."—Edin. Review.

"A well written and ingenious work."

Campbell, Thomas, 1777–1844, a native of Glasgow, was educated at the University of that city, where he was distinguished for his proficiency in classical studies. In 1799 he pub. The Pleasures of Hope, Edin., 12mo, dedicated to Dr. Anderson. Four editions were called for within a year. He had sold the copyright to Mr. Mundell for £21, but the generous bookseller gave the author £50 for each succeeding edition. Campbell now visited the Continent, and from the monastery of St. Jacob witnessed the battle of Hohenlinden, Dec. 3, 1800. He has commemorated the dreadful spectacle in lines which will never be forgotten. At Hamburg, in 1801, he composed The Exile of Erin, and Ye Mariners of England. Returning home, he resided for upwards of a year in Edinburgh, where he wrote Lochiel's Warning, which Sir Walter Scott heard read, read it himself, and then repeated the whole from memory. In 1803 he pub. in London an edition of his poems in 4to. In this year he was married to Miss Martha Sinclair, of Edinburgh, and settled at Sydenham, in Kent. In 1806 he pub. Annals of Great Britain from the Accession of George III. to the Peace of Amiens. In 1805 his means had been increased by a pension of £200 per annum. In 1809 appeared Gertrude of Wyoming, a Pennsylvanian Tale, (and other Poems,) which confirmed his poetical reputation. In 1818 he again visited Germany. In 1819 he pub. his Specimens of the British Poets, with biographical and critical notices, and an Essay on English Poetry, 7 vols. 8vo; 1841, '45, '48.

"In the Biographies, the Editor has exerted the main part of his strength on the Merris and Writings of each Poet as an Author, with an intention to form A COMPLETE BODY OF ENGLISH POETICAL CRITICISM."

"Rich in exquisite examples of English Poetry, and suggestions of delightful thoughts beyond any volume in the language."—Lon. Atlas.

"We are very glad to see Mr. Campbell in any way, and we think the work which he has now given us very excellent and delightful."—Edin. Review.

The Selections however are not the best "Specimens" of the authors. From 1810–20 he edited The New Monthly Magazine, to which he contributed many beautiful poems; of these, perhaps, The Last Man has been most admired. In 1820 he delivered a course of Lectures on Poetry at the Surrey Institution. In 1824 appeared Theoric and other Poems. In 1827 he was elected Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow. The dignified Lord Rector commenced his duties as follows:

"It was deep snow when he reached the College-green, the student were drawn up in parties, pelting one another: the poet ran into the ranks, threw several snow-balls with unerring aim, then summoning the scholars around him in the hall, delivered a speech replete with philosophy and eloquence. It is needless to say how it was received."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

In 1830 he started the Metropolitan Magazine, to which Thomas Moore occasionally contributed. It subsequently fell into the hands of Captain Marryat. In 1834 he pub. the Life of Mrs. Siddons, 2 vols. 8vo.

In his letters from the South, 1837, 2 vols. 8vo, or A Poet's Residence in Algiers, 1845, 2 vols. 8vo, originally pub. in The New Monthly Magazine, we have an entertaining picture of scenes which produced a deep impression on the writer.

"These admirable letters furnish us with by far the most interesting and picturesque sketches of Algiers and the adjacent districts that we have yet met with."—Lon. Sun.

"A most remarkable and interesting book."—John Bull.

The Life and Times of Petrarch, 2 vols. 8vo, 1841.

"The standard life of Petrarch. The fortunes and career of the poet are traced with admirable distinctness; his devoted passion for Laura is finely developed and characterized; and his poetical character is analysed and estimated with all the power of a kindred genius. "This 'Life of Frederick the Great' will become a standard work in the libraries of England."—Scotsman.

The Pilgrim of Glencoe, and other poems, 1842. A Life of Shakespeare. In 1843 Mr. Campbell visited Boulogne, accompanied by his niece, for the benefit of his health, and resided there until his death, June 15th, 1844. He lies in Westminster Abbey. His friend Dr. William Beattie was with him in the "inevitable hour," and has favoured the world with his life and letters, 3 vols. p. 8vo, 1848.

"The Pleasures of Hope, a poem dear to every reader of poetry, bore, amidst many beauties, the marks of a juvenile composition, and received from the public the indulgence due to a promise of future excellence. Some license was also allowed for the didactic nature of the subject, which, prescribing no formal plan, left the poet free to indulge his fancy in excursions as irregular as they are elegant and animated. It is a consequence of both these circumstances that the poem presents in some degree the appearance of an unfinished picture. . . . The merits and defects of Gertrude of Wyoming have this marked singularity, that the latter intrude upon us at the very first reading, whereas, after repeated perusals, we perceive beauties which had previously escaped our notice."—Lon. Quarterly Review, i. 241.

"We rejoice to see once more a polished and pathetic poem in the old style of English pathos and poetry. This (Gertrude of Wyoming) is of the pitch of the Castle of Indolence, and the finer parts of Spenser; with more feeling, in many places, than the first, and more condensation and diligent finishing than the latter. If the true tone of nature be not everywhere maintained, it gives place, at least, to art only, and not to affectation—and, least of all, to affectation of singularity or rudeness. . . . There are but two noble sorts of poetry—the pathetic, and the sublime; and we think he has given us very extraordinary proofs of his talents for both."—Lord Jeffrey: Edin. Review, xiv. 1.

"I do not think I overrate the merits of the 'Pleasures of Hope,' whether taking it in its parts, or as a whole. In preferring it to any didactic poem of equal length in the English language. No poet, at such an age, ever produced such an exquisite specimen of poetical mastery—that is, of fine conception and of high art combined. Sentiments tender, energetic, impassioned, eloquent and majestic, are conveyed to the reader in the tones of a music forever varied—sinking or swelling like the harmonies of an Eolian lyre—yet ever delightful; and these are illustrated by pictures from romance, history, or domestic life, replete with power and beauty. It is a long fit of inspiration—a checked melody of transcendent excellence; passage after passage presenting only an ever-varying and varied tissue of whatever is beautiful and sublime in the soul of men and the aspects of nature. . . . The greatest effort of Campbell's genius, however, was his 'Gertrude of Wyoming,' nor is it ever likely to be excelled in its own peculiar style of excellence. It is superior to 'The Pleasures of Hope' in the only one thing in which that poem could be surpassed—purity of diction; while in pathos, and in imaginative power, it is no whit inferior."—Moir's Poet. Lit. of Past Half-Century.

"The Pleasures of Hope is one of the most beautiful didactic poems in our language."—Lord Byron.

Much disappointment was felt that Campbell did not give more to the world than the few compositions which evinced the possession of such exalted poetical genius.

"What a pity it is," said Sir Walter Scott to Washington Irving, "that Campbell does not write oftener, and give full sweep to his genius! He has wings that would bear him to the skies, and he does, now and then, spread them grandly, but folds them up again and resumes his perch, as if he was afraid to launch them. The fact is, Campbell is, in a manner, a bugbear to himself; the brightness of his early success is a detriment to all his after efforts. He is afraid of the shadow that his own fame cast before him."

"He was detected in treasonable practices; and, being put to the rack, and confessing his guilt, he was publicly executed. "The marginal references of Canne are generally very judicious. They still retain a considerable reputation, though most of the latter editions which pass under the name of Canne's Bible are full of errors, and crowded with references which do not belong to the original author. Canning, George, 1770–1827, the son of the preceding, was only one year old when his father died of a broken heart, after unavailing efforts to procure a comfortable livelihood. Mrs. Canning established a small school, and subsequently tried her fortune on the stage, where she was not successful. George was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, and distinguished himself by his application and uncommon talents. In 1793 he entered Parliament, as member for Newport in the Isle of Wight, and in 1796 was appointed under Secretary of State. When the Marquis of Hastings was recalled from India, Canning was appointed Governor General; but the death of the Marquis of Londonderry, August 12, 1822, altered this arrangement, and Mr. Canning was appointed Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He was actively engaged in public life for nearly 34 years, 11 of which were spent in connection with Mr. Pitt. As an orator Mr. Canning's abilities were of the first order.

"Among our own orators Mr. Canning seems to be the best model of the adorned style. In some qualities of style he surpassed Mr. Pitt. His diction was more various, sometimes more simple, more idiomatical, even in its more elevated parts. It sparkled with imagery, and was brightened by illustration; in both of which Mr. Pitt, for so great an orator, was defective."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

His famous speech on the Silk Trade in 1826 will be found in a volume of the speeches made on that subject, pub. Lon., 1826, 8vo. In his 15th year, whilst at Eton, he established a periodical for the scholars, entitled The Microcosm, which he edited, and to which he contributed some remarkable papers signed B. In 1797, in conjunction with George Ellis, Frere, and others, he started The Anti-Jacobin, which was edited by Gifford. In this periodical the Whigs were sorely berated by the choicest engines of raillery and satire. Canning's parodies on Southey and Darwin, the Knife Grinder, and the Song of Rogero, are examples of his rare powers of style and humour. His Lines on the Death of his eldest Son present a touching picture of a father's grief. The Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin has been collected into one volume. A second enlarged edition was pub. in 1854, with Explanatory Notes by C. Edmonds. Again, 1858: see Lon. Quar. Rev.; Edin. Rev., July, 1858.

Lord Byron, Lord Jeffrey, Sir James Mackintosh, Thomas Moore, and many others praised this collection as "one of the wittiest books in the language."

"These sparkling gems of wit have stood the test of more than half a century, and still their brilliancy is undimmed; nor, indeed, is their lustre likely to be tarnished by age. Mr. Edmonds, the editor, has acquitted himself ably of his task."—Lon. New Quart. Review.

"A model of political satire. The Needy Knife Grinder was a joint production of Messrs. Frere and Canning, as was also the masterly poem of New Morality, alluded to in Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers."—THOMAS MOORE.

"The great literary reputation of the Anti-Jacobin,—the interest attaching to such well-known names as those of Canning, Frere, Gifford, Wellesley, will induce the reader to glance with us at their revived productions. We rather wonder that this book waited so long for an intelligent and admiring editor. Mr. Charles Edmonds comes forward at last, and is, indeed, the 'Old Morality' of Tory libellers."—Westminster Review.

Capell, Edward, 1713–1781, a native of Suffolk, distinguished himself by his critical labours upon the text of Shakespeare. He tells us that as early as 1745 he was shocked at the licentiousness (wildness) of Hanmer's plan, and determined to prepare an edition "ex fide codicum." He pub. in 1768, 10 vols. 8vo, an edition of his favourite author, for which he received £300 from the bookseller.

"He appeared almost as lawless as any of his predecessors, vindicating his claim to public notice by his established reputation, the authoritative air of his notes, and the shrewd observations, as well as majesty, of his preface. . . . There is not among the various publications of the present literary era a more singular composition than that 'Introduction.' In style and manner it is more obsolete, and antique, than the age of which it treats. It has since been added to the prolegomena of Johnson and Steevens's edition."—Biog. Dict., 1798.

Capell announced in the title-page, "Whereunto will be added, in some other volumes, notes, critical and explanatory, and a body of various readings entire."

To these was to be added another work disclosing the sources from which Shakespeare

"Drew the greater part of his knowledge in mythological and classical matters, his fable, his history, and even the seeming peculiarities of language—to which we have given for title, The School of Shakespeare."

After the assiduous labour of forty years, Mr. Capell died without seeing his great work in print, (a volume of Notes and Readings had appeared in 1775, 4to;) it was pub. by the care of Mr. Collins in 1783, 3 vols. 4to, entitled Notes and Various Readings to Shakespeare. To which is added The School of Shakespeare, &c. These volumes contain much valuable matter. See Monthly Review and Critical Review.

He also pub. Prologues, or Select Pieces of Ancient Poetry, Lon., 1760, 8vo, and altered the Play of Antony and Cleopatra as acted at Drury Lane in 1758.

"Capell's text of Shakespeare, notwithstanding all which has been achieved since his decease, is, perhaps, one of the purest extant."—Drake's Shakespeare and His Times.

Caradoc, or Caradog, d. about 1154, a native of Llancarvan, in Wales, is said by Geoffrey of Monmouth to have been engaged in a History of the Welsh Princes, from the death of Cadwallader to the middle of the 12th century.

"This work, which there can be no doubt was written in Latin, appears to be now lost; except in a pretended Welsh version, which has again been translated into English, and printed with a continuation. How far this translation is a faithful representative of Caradoc's history, we cannot determine without the original text. Carew, or Carey, Lady Elizabeth. Marston, the Fair Queen of Jersey; a Tragedy, Lon., 1613, 4to. Langhaine is so lost to gallantry as to remark:

"For the Play itself, it is very well put, considering those times and the Lady's sex."—Account of the English Dramatick Poets, 1691.

We suspect—although he does not say so—that "The Lady's Sex" was the female sex. Othys, in his MS. comments upon Langhaine, supposes "her name should be spelt Cary, and that she was the wife of Sir Henry Cary." The Tragedy is forgotten, but the Chorus in Act the 4th, denounces of Injuria, embodies comments of Christian morality which should never be out of date.

Carew, George, Earl of Totmouth, and Baron Carew, of Clopton, President of Munster, 1547-1636, subdued a formidable rebellion in Ireland, defeated the Spaniards on their landing at Kinsale in 1601, and obliged them to abandon their projects against Ireland. The following work pub. by his natural son, Thomas Stafford, has been ascribed to his lordship: Poetica Hibernica, Ireland appeared and redressed, or an History of the late Wars of Ireland, especially within the Province of Munster, under the Government of George Carew, Knight, &c., (1599-1602,) Lon., 1633, fol.

"If any one takes the pains of looking into the preface, and into p. 201, and other parts of Poetica Hibernica, he will be convinced that Carew was not the author of it, but it was probably compiled by his directions, to which he furnished the materials."—Warren Hastings' Works, Ireland, II. 320.

"This grand and learned nobleman wrote other books relating to the affairs of Ireland, forty-two volumes whereof are in the Archbishop of Canterbury's library at Lambeth, and four volumes more of collections from the originals, in the Cotton Library."—James Nicolson's Irish Hist. Library.

Sir George translated from the French version, Maurice Ragu's Fragment of the History of Ireland. See Harris's Hibernica, 1776. He also rendered into English The Story of King Richard the Second, and Harris infers that he drew up The Genealogy of the Fitzgeralds.

The Earl of Hardwicke placed the MS. into the hands of Dr. Birch, who pub. it with his Historical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Brussels, 1593-1617, Lon., 1749, 8vo. His brother, Thomas Carey, was the author of some occasional poems, one of which was set to music by Henry Lawes, and will be found in his Ayres and Dialogues, 1653.

Carey, Henry, d. 1748, a musician and poet, was the father of GEORGE SAVILLE CAREY, (q. v.) who inherited his father's facility in composition. Poems, Lon., 1713, 8vo; 1720, 12mo; 1729, 4to. Verses on Gulliver's Travels, 1727, 8vo. Cantatas and Essays, Lon., 1724, '32. His Farce of the Contrivance, 1815, and Hanging and Marriage, 1722, are among the best-known of his pieces. His Dramatic Works were pub. in 1743, 4to: a list will be found in Biog. Dramat. The classical ballad beginning "Of all the Girls that are so smart," or "Sally in our Alley," claims Carey as its author. The Musical Century, 2 vols. fol., was pub. in 1740. As we are fond of literary coincidences, we shall record one which we discover in reading the preface to "The Musical Century." It so happened that our learned friend, the distinguished parent of the new school of Political Economy—HENRY C. CAREY, (we wish that that C. could be expunged to render the coincidence more perfect!) published in 1853 a series of Letters on International Copyright, in which the subject of Copyright in its general aspects is treated with much vigour and ability. As regards the soundness of Mr. Carey's doctrines, we are of course too wise to give an opinion, surrounded as we are in this volume with such a host of authors of opposing sentiments. Now it so happens that HENRY CAREY, of musical memory, favours us with some lines upon this subject in the Preface to his Musical Century:

"What retarded the publication thus long, was the prospect I had from an act depending in Parliament, for securing the right of copies to authors or their assigns, &c.; it being almost incredible how much I have suffered by having my works pirated; my loss on that account, for many years past, amounting to little less than £200 per annum, as I can easily make appear to any person, conversant in publication.

"As the justice of such a law is self-evident; and an act already made in favour of engravers, I doubt not but the wisdom and humanity of the Legislature will, one time or other, regulate this affair, not confining the property of authors, &c. to one particular branch, but extending it to the benefit of arts and sciences in general:

"Oh! could I see the day!"

This coincidence is worth noticing, certainly.

Sir John Hawkins thus sums up the characteristics of Carey as a musician and an author:

"As a musician Carey seems to have been of the first of the lowest rank; and as a poet, the last of that class of which Duffey was the first: with this difference, that in all the songs and poems written by him on wine, love, and such kinds of subjects, he seems to have manifested an inviolable regard for decency and good manners."

The last line is well enough, and could Carey have read Sir John's estimate, we may imagine him exclaiming with the vanquished monarch, "All is lost, save honour!"

Carey, Henry C., b. 1793, at Philadelphia, son of MATHEW CAREY, (q. v.) succeeded his father in his extensive publishing business, in 1821, and continued in a pursuit so congenial to his literary taste, until 1838. In 1824 he established the system of periodical trade-sales, which are now the ordinary channels of exchange between booksellers. Mr. Carey inherited an inclination to investigations in Political Economy, and in 1836 gave the results of his speculations to the world in an Essay on the Rate of Wages, which was expanded into The Principles of Political Economy, 1837-40, 3 vols. 8vo. The novel position assumed by Mr. Carey excited no little surprise among the European Political Economists. This work has been published in Italian at Turin, and in Swedish at Upsal.

"Bastiat has taken from Carey ideas that the American Economist had developed, and had presented to his readers with so much skill, and with such an imposing mass of facts, as in truth to leave in suspense the decision of even the most accomplished student of his works. . . . Carey, and, after him, Bastiat, have thus introduced a formula in relation to the measure of value, that I believe is destined to be universally adopted. It is a most felicitous idea. . . . In 1838 Mr. Carey pub. The Credit System in France, Great Britain, and the United States.

"An American author, Mr. H. C. Carey, well known by several excellent works, seems to me, in this matter, (Currency,) and especially in the investigation of causes and effects, to have succeeded better than the English Inquirers. As early as 1838, he had in his book—The Credit System in France, Great Britain, and the United States—clearly shown the primary causes of the perturbations occurring almost periodically in commerce and currency, and that the cause was the same in France as in England."—M. COQUELIN: Revue des Deux Mondes.

"The best work on the credit system that has ever been published."—Journal des Economistes.

In 1848 Mr. Carey pub. The Past, The Present, and The Future.

"A work whose design is to show that men are everywhere now doing precisely as has heretofore been done, and that they do so in obedience to a great and universal law, directly the reverse of that taught by Ricardo, Malthus, and their successors."—Men of the Time, New York, 1852, q. v.

"It is, as our readers see, the theory of progress, redeemed from the wildness of philosophical speculations, economically established, and brought home to us by the facts."—Dictionnaire de l'Economie Politique.

"The field surveyed by Mr. Carey in the Past and Present is a broad one—broader than that of any other book of our time—for it discusses every interest of man."—American Whig Review.

"One of the strongest and most original writers of the age."—Westminster Review.

"Every friend of agriculture ought to read Mr. Carey's remarkable and convincing work."—Stein's Journal of Agriculture.

"A volume of extensive information, deep thought, high intelligence, and, moreover, of material utility."—Lon. Morning Adver.

This work also excited great attention abroad, and has recently been published in Swedish at Stockholm. For several years Mr. C. contributed all the leading articles, and many of those less important, to the Plough, the Loom, and the Anvil. A number of these papers have been collected in a volume entitled The Harmony of Interests, Agricultural, Manufacturing, and Commercial, and others of them in a pamphlet called The Prospect; Agricultural, Manufacturing, Commercial, and Financial, at the opening of 1851.

Blackwood's Magazine remarks of The Harmony of Interests, &c.:

"Mr. Carey, the well-known statistical writer of America, has supplied us with ample materials for conducting such an inquiry; and we can safely recommend his remarkable work to all who wish to investigate the causes of the progress or decline of industrial communities."

In 1853 appeared The Slave-Trade; Domestic and Foreign; why it exists; and how it may be extinguished.

"It is an invaluable addition to the literature of the country and of the world."—New York Tribune.

"Mr. Carey has clearly substantiated his claim to be the leading writer now devoted to the study of political economy. In his pregnant discussions he has not only elevated the scientific position of his country, but nobly subverted the cause of humanity."—New York Quarterly.

Mr. Carey has also pub. (in 1840) Answers to the Questions, What Constitutes Currency? What are the Causes of its Unsteadiness? And What is the Remedy? And Letters on International Copyright, (1853.) In 1858 he gave to the world vols. i. and ii. of an important work, to be comprised in 3 vols. 8vo, entitled Principles of Social Science; also Letters to the President of the U.S., 8vo. We subjoin an examination of Mr. Carey's merits as a teacher of political economy, prepared for us by one of the most eminent of American professors of this important science:

"Mr. Carey, not only in his own country, but throughout Europe, where his writings have been extensively studied, both in their original language and in translations, is the acknowledged founder and head of a new school of Political Economy. We can only indicate the fundamental difference between his system and that in undisputed supremacy when he began his contributions to social science. This however will suffice to show how eminently hopeful, progressive, and democratic are the doctrines which he proclaimed, and with what fulness of significance those who have accepted them are styled the American school.

"Adam Smith's publication of the Wealth of Nations was contemporaneous with the opening of the American Revolution. That work explained the manner in which the course of nature tends to the concurrent and harmonious progress in well-being of all classes of society, and how, whenever the fact is wanting—wherever a community is stationary, or some classes fall back in the scale of comfort, while others advance—it is an anomaly which may be traced to human interference. If all the industrial orders, labourers, capitalists, and land-owners, fall to march forward with the procession of time towards a better and steadily improving condition, Adam Smith found the cause in misgovernment by earthly rulers, not in any defect of providential arrangements. There had been little more than time for the scholars of the continent to make themselves acquainted with Smith's system, when the convulsion of the French Revolution began. The tolling millions had jumped with a sure instinct that needed no bookish instruction to the conclusion that their industry ought, in the natural course of things, to have secured the enjoyment of the fruits that every day eluded their grasp, to fall into the hands of the idle and profligate;—that the products of labour were abundant for the material comfort of all, and that the false and partial distribution by which they were defrauded of their fair share, was due to the wickedness or incompetence of their rulers. They were prompt to seek the remedy in governmental reforms. Adam Smith had prepared the literary class for sympathising with their convictions and their aspirations. Godwin's Political Justice was, in conservative England, among the boldest and sharpest protests against the defects and failures of the existing social organization, uttered with a calmness, sobriety, and force of reasoning, that were not to be met by denouncing it as Democratic and Revolutionary, which sufficed for a reply to more intemperate writers. Mr. Malthus, a clergyman of the Established Church, while studying to refute it, was impressed with the substantial justice of the plea for reform, upon the received data for argument, and became satisfied that the evils of which the republicans complained admitted of no defence which should come short of demonstrating the necessity of their existence, or throw the responsibility for it upon the sufferers.

"It was as an answer to Godwin's book that Malthus composed his celebrated Essay on Population, the theory of which was at once accepted and remains to this day as the strongest apology of which despotism is capable. The ruling classes were not only exculpated, but they were taught to 'harden their hearts against the people' by a theory which ascribed the miseries of the governed to the regular operation of a fixed law of human and physical nature, which even that charity which endeavoured to alleviate individual suffering, could only aggravate. Malthus assigned, as the effective cause of poverty and wretchedness in the masses, a supposed law of population, according to which it has a constant tendency to outrun the growth of capital—the number of mouths to be fed to exceed the food that should fill them. The human race, according to this theory, has implanted in it such instincts and powers that under their free action it would increase in geometrical ratio, doubling every twenty-five years. The means of subsistence, on the other hand, are, as he believed, limited to an increase in arithmetical ratio. There must consequently, in the natural order of providence, be a constantly increasing disparity between the amount of property in a community—especially that of the first necessity like food—and the number of persons to divide, with a steady and ceaseless approximation towards famine. If, in point of fact, the pressure of population upon subsistence had been seen not to grow at the terrific rate which the law would demand, it was due to almost perpetual wars waged at the instigation of Kings and nobles—to frequent famines, resulting often from the devastations of war—to pestilence, brooding in the foul cabins of the poor, and fastening upon them because they were poor, ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-sheltered. Some little—if the poor had only been wiser, and piously submissive to the decrees of Heaven—should have been owing to that 'moral restraint' which it was the object of Mr. Malthus to inculcate—to abstinence from matrimony, or, if the imprudence of matrimony were committed, to defeating its purpose—the propagation of offspring. Alas, how little credit could the poor claim on this score! Scandalously prolific had they been ever and everywhere, and the weak charity of their betters had, by administering relief to the destitute, and thus interposing between their folly in begotting children, and its heaven-ordained penalty, diverted their attention from what Mr. Mill tells us is the only remedy, 'the grand practical problem—to find the means of limiting the number of births.'

"As man is a producer of food, as well as a consumer, the organic law of Malthusianism required some supplementary dogma which should explain why it is that the race cannot make its labour productive in the ratio of its numbers. This was soon supplied in the theory of Rent, which goes by the name of Ricardo, and is based upon the allegation that settlement and culture always begin upon the most fertile and best-situated lands, and as they are occupied by the growth of population, men necessarily recede to soils of progressively deteriorating quality, and possessing less advantages of situation. Each generation of cultivators expending their energies upon soils yielding returns inferior in proportion to their numbers to those tilled by their predecessors, each increment to the population would harvest a less and less increment of food, and with every year a larger proportion of the entire available labour of the community would be required for supplying its primary necessity. This, if true—and it passed without question until refuted by Mr. Carey—was a satisfactory and corroborative explanation of the laws of population. It proved that a steady declension towards misery and starvation would be the inevitable lot of the masses, even upon the supposition that all the means of subsistence were fairly and equally partitioned. But the theory did more. It taught that as soon as the necessities of society drove men to the cultivation of land of the second quality, the owners of that of the first grade acquired the power to charge for its use a rent equivalent to the difference in the crops of the two. When land of the third quality became necessary to supply the increasing mouths, the second yielded a rent, and the rent of the first was also advanced by an amount equal to the difference between the second and third. Consequently the smaller the supply of food became, the larger the proportion of it absorbed by the landlords, and the less that of the labourers. This established the necessary growth of a landed aristocracy, whose wealth and power wax, as those of the people wane. Nor was this all. It tought that the price of all raw productions was necessarily fixed by that of the portion raised with the greatest difficulty and expense, that is, on the worst soils under cultivation which pay no rent. Rent therefore did not enter into price; but price it was held was divided between wages and profits, profits being the highest when wages are least. The interests of the labourer and the capitalist are thus held to be directly antagonistic, they having to struggle with each other about the division of a continually decreasing share left by the landlord for the two.

"If this system be true, the stratification of society after the aristocratic models is as certain and inevitable as any fact in Geology, and all dreams of the equality and brotherhood of man, or age, and other costly amelioration. By geographical comparisons of contemporaneous communities, he shows that the lowest in the scale of population and wealth are those in which the inferior soils are alone cultivated, and the better he wastes; and that the degree to which they have subdued the better lands accurately marks their progress. In a prolonged disquisition in which Economists of all parts of Europe have taken part, he has repeatedly—and in vain—challenged the maintainers of the Ricardian hypothesis to name a single spot where men have not commenced on the poor soils, and proceeded to the better, with increasing numbers and wealth; or where they have not resorted to the poorer with the increases of poverty and depopulation. The acquisition of this truth gave harmony and completeness to the system. It accounted for an accelerated rate in the accumulation of capital, by showing how a decreasing proportion of a growing community is able to supply its whole with food and material, and an increasing proportion is at free to devote its labour to the conversion of that material; while it taught the philosophy of concentration as the means of facilitating exchange, and the diversification of industry. It explained the prevalence of war, and of military institutions in the earlier ages of society, by showing how and why it is that sparse communities, finding themselves stunted in food, and imagining themselves pinched in space, covet the territories of their neighbours, and waste their energies in alternate aggression and defence against the reprisal provoked by it,—how a military aristocracy and all aristocracies have been military in their origin; is possible when wages are low, and the landlord taking two-thirds of the product of his fields in the shape of rent, is able to support a retinue of men-at-arms equal in number to the cultivators, and becomes impossible as his proportion decreases, and that of the cultivators increases—how the latter successively emerge from the condition of slaves, serfs, feudal vassals, to equality of political rights, and Republican self-government. We have said enough to indicate how naturally the system of Mr. Carey, shining over and beyond the narrow field of material wealth—to which the old school of Economists, not less from necessity, than from inclination, limits itself—lights up the whole realm of political interests, and all the social relations of man. Slavery and the Slave Trade abolished by Mr. Carey in 1850, is no more than an application in micro to the elucidation of the particular topic of principles clearly established and developed in the preceding works. The circumstances and the policy which increase or diminish the power of men to control their own labour and its fruits, are treated with the same dispassionate logic as a physician would employ in treating of the cause and cure of malarious fevers, and equally irrespective of the colour or locality of the patients. In fact, it is the characteristic of Mr. Carey's system, that having based it upon physical facts, and thus brought it into affiliation with the positive sciences, he pursues the same methods of investigation which have conducted to precision and certainty in physical discovery; and has arrived at those 'great constitutive laws in which dwell dominion and the power of prophecy.'

"Our limits have confined us to the elucidation of the radical distinction between the American and European systems, at the expense of omitting any reference to the diversities of their outgrowth in the minor developments and collateral consequences. The reader must explore them for himself and we trust will ere long have new aid in the inquiry. It is the distinction of genuine science that every step opens the way for further progress, and that it tends to constant simplification, by bringing a wider range of facts under general laws, diminishing in number as they enlarge in scope. We have reason to expect from Mr. Carey the publication of his maturest views in the order of their logical genesis. This is usually the reverse of the order of discovery, and admits of much greater condensation, for man's path to the central and truer truth is through a converging spiral. As he has advanced from circle to circle, he has announced his progress in treatises, not essentially polemic and critical, yet necessarily swelled by a mass of evidence and illustration which may now be dispensed. To prove empirically that the planets revolve in ellipses, requires innumerable observations of their actual position and volumes of figures, but the demonstration becomes brief and easy as soon as the focus and the law of attraction have been ascertained.

"Mr. Carey has been an industrious anonymous writer in Magazines and Journals, in defence of the protective policy which is theory for the first time made logically tenable, and reconciled with the philosophy of Adam Smith, which those who quote without reading, or read but in scraps, assume to condemn. The Harmony of Interests—Agricultural, Manufacturing, and Commercial, is devoted expressly to this topic."

Carey, John, LL.D., d. 1829, a native of Ireland, was well known as the editor of more than 50 volumes of the Regent's Classics, of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary, &c., and author and translator of several useful works. We notice the following valuable work: Schleusner's New Testament Lexicon, compressed into the Form of a Manual, London, 1826, 8vo.

"The main principle of this volume is, that it contains all Schleusner's lexicographical interpretations, together with his scripture references, and this without abridgement; while nothing is sacrificed but what, in a majority of instances, may be advantageously dispensed with. . . . Dr. Carey's name is a guarantee for correct impression."—Lon. Eclectic Review, N. S. xxi. 180.

Carey, John. See CARV.

Carey, Mathew, 1760-1839, an eminent philanthropist, was a native of Dublin. His father, a man of great intelligence, bestowed upon him and his five brothers a liberal education, and they all subsequently became distinguished for their learning or literary taste. At the early age of 17, Mathew pub. an Essay on Duelling, which was followed in 1779 by A Letter to the Catholics of Ireland, which caused much excitement, and compelled his temporary exile to France, where he made the acquaintance of Dr. Franklin, with whom, and with the Marquis de Lafayette, Mr. Carey was on terms of friendship. Returning to Ireland, he established the Volunteer's Journal, which speedily took its place as the leading opposition paper of the day, but persecution from the government led to his arrest and imprisonment, and finally forced him in 1783 to quit his country. Arrived in Philadelphia, where he continued to reside until his death in 1839, he commenced his career in 1785 as editor and proprietor of the Pennsylvania Herald, and this was followed by the American Museum, a monthly journal of which he was also editor. This periodical extended to 13 volumes, 1787-92, and forms a valuable record of the facts of that period. Mr. Carey was author of numerous pamphlets on various subjects of public interest, and of several books which had much success. Of these the earliest published in America was a History of the Yellow Fever of 1793, of which four editions were published. In 1810, '11, he pub. Letters and Reflections upon the United States Bank. In 1814 appeared The Olive Branch, or Faults on both Sides, Federal and Democratic, an appeal to the good sense of the political parties of the day to lay aside their differences during the pendency of the then existing war with Great Britain: this paper speedily passed through ten editions, comprising 10,000 copies.

"No publication has appeared since the formation of the American Government which contains such copious and authentic information of the state of the country."

In 1818 appeared his Vindiciae Hibernicae: an examination and refutation of the charges against his countrymen, in relation to the alleged butcheries of Protestants in the insurrection of 1640: this work passed through several editions. In 1820 he gave to the world The New Olive Branch, and in 1822 Essays on Political Economy, both advocating the policy of protection to domestic manufactures. It is worthy of remark that it is in this particular department—the science of Political Economy—that one of Mr. Carey's sons (see article HENRY C. CAREY) has become so conspicuous a labourer. Mathew Carey also pub. a volume of Miscellaneous Essays. As the most eminent publisher in the United States, he contributed largely to the dissemination of sound intelligence amidst a population too much occupied with the material cares of life to be properly attentive to intellectual culture. Our limited space prevents more than a passing notice of Mr. Carey's zealous efforts on behalf of the helpless and afflicted—of his persevering labours in the promotion of public improvements and private happiness. We could say nothing so much to the purpose as is contained in the following extract from a letter to the late Joseph Reed, Esq., of Philadelphia, (son of President Reed), from the late John Sergeant, Esq., long one of the most eminent statesmen of the United States:

"Mr. Carey—a man to whom we are all a great deal more indebted than we are aware of, and who is entitled to respect and regard for the generosity of his nature, the extent and variety of his knowledge, and his devoted and disinterested exertions in the public service. He has given more time, money, and labour to the public than any man I am acquainted with, and, in truth, has founded in Philadelphia a school of public spirit. This is bare justice to an excellent citizen, to whom also I am free to acknowledge my own particular obligations for his uniform friendship."—Mexico, April 19, 1827.

The citizens of the United States will ever owe to Mr. Carey's memory a debt of gratitude for his invaluable labours as a citizen, a politician, and a philanthropist.

Carey, or Cary, Robert, first Earl of Monmouth, b. 1559 or 1560, d. 1639, a near relation of Queen Elizabeth, and father of Henry Carey, second Earl of Monmouth, left MS. memoirs of his own life, which were lent by Lady Elizabeth Spelman to JOHN, EARL OF CORK AND ORRERY, (q. v.) who transcribed them with his own hand, and pub. them in 1759, 8vo. They contain some curious particulars of the secret history of the Elizabethan period. Horace Walpole, who recommended their publication, is complimented by the Earl of Cork as exhibiting (in his Royal and Noble Authors)

"So spirited a manner of writing, that he has given wit even to a Dictionary, and vivacity to a catalogue of names."

Among those on whose behalf his pen was early enlisted may be mentioned Chantrey, Hogan, Gibson, and James Montgomery.

Carlie, George, M.D. Con. to Phil. Trans., 1764.

Carlie, George William Frederick Howard, the present Earl of Carlie, b. 1802, is well known as a man of letters. His lordship a few years ago travelled in America, and on his return communicated the results of his observations in 1850, in a lecture delivered before the Mechanics' Institute at Leeds. Some of his comments have found their way into the journals. His lordship also delivered before the same excellent institution a lecture upon the Life and Writings of Pope. In 1854 he published A Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters, p. 8vo; Amer. ed., edited, with Notes, by Prof. C. C. Felton, Bost., 1855, 12mo.

"An unpretending volume, which bears on every page evidence of the wise and tolerant spirit, the various scholarship, and the sensibility to the beautiful so characteristic of its noble author. . . . The account of Malta is not the least attractive portion of this charming work, to which Felton's notes have given additional value."—Wm. H. Parnock: Philip the Second, 1856, l. 592, n. 501, n.

A volume on the Education of Youth, and a poem in Pearce's Collection entitled The Fairy's Answer to Mrs. Greville's Prayer for Indifference, have been ascribed to her ladyship.

Carlyle, Robert. De Vaux; a Poem, 1818, 8vo.

Carlyle, Thomas, the "Censor of the age," was born in 1795 at Ecclefechan, in Dumfriesshire. His father, an agriculturist, was noted for quickness of mental perceptions, and great energy and decision of character. After preliminary instruction at a school at Annan, Thomas was sent in 1810 to the University of Edinburgh, where he remained for seven or eight years, distinguishing himself by devotion to mathematical studies then taught there by Leslie. He seems at this period to have designed entering the ministry, but the idea was abandoned. For about two years he taught mathematics at a school in Fife; on relinquishing this post, he devoted himself in 1823 to literature as a profession. In 1824 he contributed to Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopedia the articles "Montesquieu," "Montaigne," "Nelson," "Norfolk," and those on the two "Pitts;" to the New Edinburgh Review, an Essay on Joanna Baillie's Plays of the Passions. In the same year he completed a translation of Legendre's Geometry, to which he prefixed an Essay on Proportion, and also pub. his trans. of Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, "a work which betrayed a direction of reading destined to influence materially his future career." After completing his trans., he commenced his Life of Schiller, which was pub. in numbers in the London Magazine.—Men of the Time, Lon., 1863.

The Life of Schiller was highly commended: "Schiller was one of the great men of his age, and Carlyle has given evidence in this book of a critical insight into his character, both as a man and a writer. His analysis of the works of Schiller, and his critical observations, are deeply interesting and instructive. The book will be read with pleasure and profit."—Lon. Examiner.

About 1838 Mr. Carlyle married, and resided alternately at Comely Bank and Craigenputtock, in an estate in Dumfriesshire. The reader will find an interesting account of his manner of life in the letters to Goethe, in the correspondence of the great German bard.

"Two ponies which carry us everywhere, and the mountain air, are the best medicines for weak nerves. This daily exercise, to which I am much devoted, is my only distraction. For this week of ours [Craigenputtock] is the loveliest in Britain—six miles removed from every one who in any case might visit us. How Rousseau would have been as happy as on his island of St. Pierre!"

In his rural quietude Mr. Carlyle was a contributor to the Foreign Review and other periodicals, and composed his Sartor Resartus, which was pub. in Fraser's Magazine on Mr. Carlyle's return to London, which occurred in 1830. It appeared in book form in 1834, "reprinted for friends," and in 1836; again in 1841.

"The work is a sort of philosophical romance, in which the author undertakes to give, in the form of a review of a German treatise on drama, and a notice of the life of the writer, his own opinions upon Matters and Things in General. The hero, Frederick Teufelsdröckh, seems to be intended for a portrait of human nature as affected by the moral influences to which, in the present state of society, a cultivated mind is naturally exposed. The volume contains, under a quaint and singular form, a great deal of deep thought, sound principle, and fine writing. The only thing about the work, tending to prove that it is what it purports to be, a commentary on a real German treatise, is the style, which is a sort of babyish dialect, not destitute, it is true, of richness, vigor, and at times a sort of felicity of expression, but very strongly stamped throughout with the peculiarities of the German language. This quality in the style, however, may be a mere result of a great familiarity with German literature, and we must not, therefore, look outweighing so much evil, we believe, no mortal in power to whom the public the late British Reviewers, by the singularity of their manner. Among them is Characteristics and the r, and on Goethe in the For introducing to the Am in a great measure unknown among us, but who is destined, we think, to occupy a large space in the literary world. We have heard it insinuated that Mr. Carlyle has it in contemplation to visit this country, and we can venture to assure him, that should he carry this intention into effect, he will meet with a cordial welcome."—ALEXANDER H. EVANS: N. Amer. Review, xlii. 464, 1836.

In 1837 he pub. The French Revolution, 3 vols. a. 8vo: vol. I., The Bastille; vol. II., The Constitution; vol. III., The Guillotine. This work produced a profound impression upon the public mind.

"No work of greater genius, either historical or political, has been produced in this country for many years. A more penetrating or accurate investigator of facts and institutions never wielded the historical pen."—Westminster Review.

"Let a man who would exhibit the frightful drama of the French Revolution for the benefit of his reader, place the reader before its scenes, and leave him to himself—as most men, in going through an interesting building, long to be left alone and not to be troubled with the importunities of a guide. The scenes themselves are already there—not painted or described as by a spectator, but existing un-intentionally in the records of the time. Few things, perhaps, would do more to arrest our present headlong course of life than the highly-wrought language would be required, or any language but that employed by the actors themselves. The most graphic portions of Mr. Carlyle's work are those in which he has most closely transcribed from these sources; and in other parts we think he has failed to convey not only a correct philosophical view of the history, but even clear, vivid pictures of fact."—Lon. Quarterly Review, lvi. 467.

"After perusing the whole of this extraordinary work, we can allow almost to their fullest extent, the high qualities with which Mr. Carlyle's lecturers endow him."—Lon. Times.

"This is one of the few books of our time that are likely to live for some generations beyond it. Some years will pass before these volumes begin to be generally refuted, but refuted they will be, and that thoroughly, sooner or later."—Lon. Examiner.

"There is no account of the French Revolution that can be in the slightest degree compared with this for intensity of feeling and profundity of thought."—Lon. Monthly Repository.

"It would be as interesting book if well translated into English."

In 1839 appeared Chartism; 2d edit., 1840, p. 8vo. See a Review of this work in the British and Foreign Review, xi. 1; also articles on Chartism in vol. xii. 363, and in Blackwood's Mag., xli. 388. His Six Lectures on Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History, delivered in London in 1840, were pub. in 1841, and 4th edit. in 1863, 13mo. In 1843 Mr. C. pub. his Past and Present, p. 8vo.

"Past and Present has not, and could not have, the same wild power which Sartor Resartus possessed, in our opinion, over the feelings of the reader, but it contains passages which look the same way, and breathe the same spirit."—Blackwood's Mag., liv. 120.

Mr. C.'s Critical and Miscellaneous Essays have been collected, and the 3d edit. was pub. in London in 1847, 4 vols. p. 8vo. They have also been pub. in America. See a review in Brit. Quart. Rev., li. 297. In the same year appeared the 2d edit. of the Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell. Mr. Carlyle's Letter Day Pamphlets, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, were pub. in 1850, p. 8vo: the life of his friend, John Sterling, pub. in 1851. The 3d edit. of The French Revolution was pub. in 1856-57, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 3d edit. of Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, 1857, 3 vols. p. 8vo; 4th edit. of Essays, 1857, 4 vols. p. 8vo; Lives of Schiller and Sterling, 1857, p. 8vo, (vol. vi. of collective ed. of Carlyle's works.) The Life of Frederick the Great, Lon. and New York, 1858, 3 vols. 8vo. A critic remarks, "The work is thoroughly Carlylish, and worthy of the author. It has long been announced that it was to be the work of his life."

"Few writers of the present time have risen more rapidly into popularity than Mr. Carlyle, after laboring through so long a period of comparative neglect. Whatever judgment critics may be pleased to pass on him, it is certain that his works have attracted of late no common share of attention."—Edinburgh Review.

We have quoted some highly commendatory notices of Mr. Carlyle as an author, but by many critics the peculiarities of his style have been severely censured, and the value of his speculations greatly doubted.

"Mr. Carlyle has discarded the easy balustrade, and struck out a new mode in writing, combining, we had almost said, all possible faults, and yet not unlikely to become popular. . . . It is certainly to me that Mr. Carlyle's early writings, in which there is far the most truth and genuine good nature, are the most free from his faults. They appear to have gathered on him as he advanced. Is it that he is permitting himself to dress up his style like a mountebank to attract popular wonderment, which we have too good an opinion of him to believe? Or is it that his mind itself, as we feel, is becoming embarrassed and perplexed with the speculations into which he is falling, and in which he evidently to promulgate. . . . He is saying things but a man of practical ability, setting aside his style for the present, let us see whether he has ever. In the course of his life, thrown out a single hint which could be useful to his own generation, or profitable to those who may come after. If he could originate any such hint, he does not possess the power of embodying it in distinct language. He has written a History of the French Revolution, a pamphlet on Chartism, a work on Heroes and Hero-worship, and a sort of political treatise entitled Past and Present. Can any living man point to a single practical passage in any of these volumes? If not, what is the real value of Mr. Carlyle's writings? What is Mr. Carlyle himself but a Phantasm of the species he is pleased to denounce."—Blackwood's Mag., liv. 1848; lvi. 1850.

Carte, Samuel, 1653-1740, Prebendary of Lichfield, Coventry, England, was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. Serms., 1649, 1705, 4to. Tabula Chronologica Archiepiscopatum et Episcopatum in Anglia et Wallia, &c., sine anno. Con. to Phil. Trans. and Bibl. Top. Brit. He was an intelligent antiquary, and Dr. Willis and Dr. Stukeley acknowledged his assistance.

Carte, Samuel, grandson of the above, also a learned antiquary, edited Brewster's Collectanea Ecclesiastica, to which he added some valuable notes. He also assisted Johnson in his account of the benefactions and charities of Coventry. See Archæol., x. 209, 1792.

Carte, Thomas, 1686-1754, father of the above, was a native of Clifton, in Warwickshire. He was admitted of University College, Oxford, in 1698; took his degree of B.A. in 1702, and was subsequently incorporated at Cambridge, where he became M.A. in 1706. After travelling on the Continent, he entered into holy orders, and was appointed reader of the Abbey Church at Bath, where he preached a discourse, January 30, 1714, in which he vindicated the character of Charles I. with reference to the Irish rebellion. This elicited a controversy with Dr. Chandler, which called forth Carte's first publication—The Irish Massacre set in a Clear Light; see Lord Somers's Tracts. When George I. ascended the throne, Carte was unwilling to take the oaths to the new government, and therefore assumed a lay habit. For a time he assisted Jeremy Collier, who preached to a Nonjuring congregation in London. Carte was suspected of being concerned in the rebellion of 1715, and orders were issued for his arrest. He escaped, and became secretary to Bishop Atterbury, which increased the suspicions against him, and a reward of £1000 was offered for his person. Carte now fled to France, where he resided for some years under the name of Phipps. He mingled with men of learning, and frequented the best libraries, which enabled him to collect materials for illustrating an English edition of Thuanus. In 1724 he consulted Dr. Mead as to the best mode of publication. The doctor perceived the value of the collection, and determined to publish the whole. He purchased them from Carte, and confided them to the care of Mr. Buckley, who gave them to the world in 1733, 7 vols. fol. By the intercession of Queen Caroline, Carte was permitted to return to his native country. He arrived in England between 1728 and 1730. In 1735 appeared the 3d and in 1736 the 1st and 2d vols. (fol.) of his History of the Life of James, Duke of Ormonde, from his birth in 1610 to his death in 1688. This is one of the most important historical works in the language, and contains the fullest account of the Irish rebellion. The author was rewarded by the approbation of the best judges in the premises:

"Your history is in great esteem here. All sides seem to like it. The dean of St. Patrick's [Swift] honours you with his approbation. Any name after his could not add to your satisfaction. But I may say, the worthy and the wise are with you to a man, and you have me into the bargain."—Lord Orrery's Letter to Carte.
 "Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormonde is considered as a book of authority; but it is ill written. The matter is diffused in too many words; there is no animation, no compression, no vigour.

Two good volumes in duodecimo might be made out of the two [three] in folio."—Dr. Johnson.

We are glad that the doctor's expunging views were not adopted by the editor of the beautiful edition pub. in 1851, Oxford, 6 vols. 8vo. Let the historical reader procure this edition forthwith.

The author had long projected a history of England—finding much fault with Rapin and with Rymer's Fœdera—and in April, 1738, he pub. "A general account of the necessary materials for a history of England, of the society and subscriptions proposed for defraying the expenses of it, and the method in which he intended to proceed in carrying on the work." In October £600 per annum were subscribed, and the historian set to work with a glad heart. We have not space in which to enumerate the learned and corporate bodies who favoured this great undertaking: suffice it to say that seldom has an author been so encouraged:

"Never was a history more anxiously expected, and more zealously supported. The City of London and the University of Oxford seemed to vie with each other in their acts of generosity."—Dibdin's Library Companion.

In 1744 he was arrested by the government for supposed designs favourable to the Pretender, but nothing was found to justify his detention. In August, 1744, was printed in an 8vo pamphlet, "A collection of the several papers that had been published by him relative to his great work." Proposals for printing were circulated in 1746, and in December, 1747, the first volume was given to the world.

"Of the first volume of this History, 180 copies were printed on royal paper, 850 on a second size, and 2000 on small paper. Of the succeeding volumes, 100 only were printed on royal paper, and 650 on small paper."—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, ii. p. 191.

But a few lines in this noble book were permitted to bring the whole into undeserved odium. Carte in one of his notes, not originally intended for publication, refers to the "sanative virtue of touching for the king's evil," and adduces the case of a Christopher Lovel who was touched by the Pretender, and cured. We make a short extract, as this is a curious literary anecdote:

"From thence Christopher made his way first to Paris, and thence to the place where he was touched, in the beginning of November following, by the eldest lineal descendant of a race of kings, who had indeed for a long succession of ages cured that distemper by the royal touch. But this descendant and next heir of their blood had not, at least at that time, been crowned or anointed."

Now there was no treason in this. His avowed object was to prove that it was an error to suppose that the "sanative virtue" resided only in the eldest descendant of the royal line, or in the wearer of the crown. That the Pretender had the blood-royal in his veins, no one could deny. But the corporation of London, perhaps not unwilling to recommend themselves to the reigning monarch by their rather ostentatious loyalty, withdrew their subscriptions, and the history was neglected by the Bosonians of that generation. In 1749 it was retailed at a shilling a number (36 nos., i. e. vol. 1, all yet pub.) to those who had the sense to profit by the stolidity of their neighbours. But Carte struggled manfully on. The 2d vol.—1216-1609—appeared in 1750; and the 3d—1509-1613—in 1752. Vol. 4th, 1613-54, was pub. in 1755, about a year after the author's decease. He intended to have brought it down to the Restoration. His valuable materials were left by Mrs. Carte, for his lifetime, to her second husband, Mr. Jernegan, then to be deposited in the University of Oxford. Mr. Jernegan delivered them to the University in 1778, for a valuable consideration. Whilst they were in his possession, he charged the Earl of Hardwicke £200 for the perusal of them, and Mr. Macpherson paid £300 for the same privilege. His History of Great Britain, Lon., 1775, 2 vols. 4to, and Original Papers, 1775, 2 vols. 4to, with Extracts from the Life of James II., as written by himself, show that he was disposed to lose nothing by the investment.

"The character of Macpherson seems at an end. He endeavoured to deceive the public, and to make them believe that the extracts he gave were from the king's own journal; but this they were not. He never saw the journal, as I have before mentioned. He made extracts from the Stuart papers, and additions from Carte."—Fraser's Lectures on Mod. Hist.

For the ten 4to vols. of the Brunswick Papers, Macpherson was indebted to a fortunate purchase of Mr. Duane's.

Mr. Jernegan was pleased with such a profitable mode of assisting literary antiquaries, and as late as 1775 he advertised that he was still willing to loan them for a consideration. But there were no more Earl Hardwicke's and Macpherson's to be found, and, as we have stated, he received a handsome sum in 1778 to place them in their intended repository. We need not wonder that few were hardy enough to attack "20 folios, 15 quartos, and some loose papers" in MS.: for such was the bulk of those which treated of matters from 1654 to 1688. Of borrowers from Carte, Hume is one of the largest, and would have acted with more justice by a frank acknowledgment of his obligations. It is amusing to observe the cavalier manner in which he incidentally alludes to Carte in his notes as "a late author of great industry and learning, but full of prejudices and of no penetration." The two authors occupy the same relative position as those of the laborious miner and the skilful polisher of the precious metal, which but for the assiduity of the former might still be undistinguished beneath the elod. But those who wish to gather all the gold must still revert to Carte.

"You may read Hume for his eloquence, but Carte is the historian for facts."—WARTON.

"Although the author died before the publication of the last volume in 1755—intending to bring his work down to the Restoration—yet he lived long enough to witness its success, and the victory which he obtained over its numerous opponents, and the shame attached to those who had withdrawn their original patronage. This work will live long, and always be consulted."—Dobson's Library Companion.

"Notwithstanding our author's opinions and prejudices, his general History is undoubtedly a work of great merit in point of information. It is written with eminent exactness and diligence, and with a perfect knowledge of original authors."—Biog. Brit.

"In the early part of the English History, I should always prefer the history of Carte to any other historian. He was indefatigable himself in his researches, having dedicated his whole life to them, and was assisted in what relates to Wales by the labours of Mr. Lewis Morris, of Penbryn, in Cardiganshire. As for his political prejudices, they cannot be supposed to have had any bias in what relates to a transaction five hundred years ago, and which hath nothing to do with the royal touch for the cure of king's evil."—DAVID BARRINGTON.

"His learned work, which in other respects is but indifferently written, is replete with very useful researches, though mixed with incurable prejudices."—MONS. D'ERVAVOUR: voyez Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne, 1768.

Dr. Richard Rawlinson declined the arduous task of completing this valuable History. Mr. Carte also pub. The History of the Revolution of Portugal, 1740, 8vo, some Translations, &c. In 1742 he pub. A Full Answer to a Letter from a Bystander, (Corbyn Morris, Esq., F.R.S.), which appeared in 1741. This elicited some other pamphlets.

"These tracts embody much curious discussion and information with respect to taxation, and the expenditure of the public revenue for a lengthened period."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Economy.

By no means: THOMAS BAKER'S MS. Collections afford a much better guide, (see the name in this volume,) where we have already urged the preparation of an ATHENS CANTABRIGIENSIS. With all due modesty, we think that this Dictionary would be a great assistance to a Cambridge Anthony Wood. We give a specimen of Carter's work:

"In the course of this work, Mr. Carter mentions such as were most famous for their learning and abilities, belonging to that University; and as a specimen of his judgment and talents for characterising learned men, take the following account of the great Dr. MIDDLETON.

"Dr. CORNELL MIDDLETON, Fellow of Trinity College, many years chief librarian of this University, author of Marcus Tullius Cicero, A free country into the miraculous powers, &c., and some other learned pieces, in which he displayed his learning, and lost his character, as a divine and a churchman." See Lon. Mon. Rev., 1753.

After perusing this copious and perspicuous morsel of biography and bibliography, even we feel encouraged to proceed.

Carter, Elizabeth, 1717–1806, an ornament to her sex, and an honour to her race, was the eldest daughter of the Rev. Nicholas Carter, D.D., perpetual curate of the chapel in the town of Deal, Kent. Whilst yet very young, she displayed a great desire for knowledge, to which was added unwearied diligence in its acquisition, which is the more creditable from the difficulty she experienced in learning.

"This ardent thirst after knowledge was at length crowned with complete success, and her acquirements became, even very early in life, such as are rarely met with. What she once gained, she never afterwards lost, an effect, indeed, to be expected from the intense application by which she acquired her learning, and which is often by no means the case with those, the quickness of whose faculties renders labour almost useless."—REV. MONTAGU PENNINGTON: Memoirs of Mrs. Carter, Lon., 1807, 4to.

She first made her appearance as an author in 1738, when she published a volume of Poems, (in 4to,) composed before she was twenty years of age. These were first pub. anonymously, and were not subsequently much admired by the fair author, for in another collection, pub. in 1762, 8vo, she only admitted two pieces from the former volume; i. e. Lines on her Birth-Day, and an Ode on Anacreon, which she had trans. before her 17th year. In 1739 she pub. a trans. from the French—the Examen de Croussas on Pope's Essay on Man. In the same year she gave to the world a trans. from the Italian of Algorotti's Newtonionismo par le Dame; Algorotti's Explanation of Newton's Philosophy for the Use of the Ladies, 2 vols. 12mo. These evidences of ability gave the authoress considerable reputation in the literary world at home and abroad. Her Ode to Wisdom, one of her best poetical pieces, was composed in 1746. In 1749, at the solicitation of her friend Miss Talbot, and Dr. Secker, then Bishop of Oxford, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, she commenced a translation of the writings of Epictetus. The choice was a good one. Hereby all were admitted to enter

"That noble school of Philosophy, which preserved great souls untainted at the court of dissolute and ferocious tyrants, which exalted the slave [Epictetus] of one of Nero's courtiers to be a moral teacher of after times."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

This excellent work, not originally intended for the press, was pub. in 1758, 4to; pp. 34 and 505. 1018 copies were struck off at once, and 250 more within three months afterwards. The price was one guinea.

"It sold so well, and the price kept up so remarkably, that some years after Dr. Secker, then Archbishop of Canterbury, brought a bookseller's catalogue to her, saying, Here, Madam Carter, see how ill I am used by the world; here are my sermons selling at half-price, while your Epictetus truly is not to be had under 18 shillings; only three shillings less than the original subscription."

By this publication Mrs. C. was a gainer by about £1000. As regards the merits of this translation, it is sufficient to quote Dr. Warton's opinion that it "exceeds the original." Her reputation as a profound and elegant classical scholar was now established upon a firm basis. Dr. Johnson had always been a warm admirer of her talents, and as early as April, 1738, wrote to Cave:

"I have composed a Greek epigram to Eliza, and think she ought to be celebrated in as many different languages as Lewis le Grand." See Gent. Mag., April, 1738, for this Epigram to Eliza.

Cave thought that they should be better known to each other, and introduced them. Johnson was then 29, and "Eliza" 21. She mentioned the name of her new acquaintance to her father, in a letter to the worthy clergyman. His answer is amusing to the present generation:

"You mention Johnson; but that is a name with which I am utterly unacquainted. Neither his scholastic, critical, nor poetical character ever reached my ears. I a little suspect his judgment if he is very fond of Martial."—Pennington's Memoirs of Mrs. Carter.

Now, when a young lady dwells in her letters upon the name of a new male acquaintance, especially if she be of a literary turn, and adduce his literary tastes, be assured that her heart is no Gibraltar. Even Johnson's physical ugliness could be forgotten in the classic charm of his comments upon Martial, and other worthies of the "elder time." But, alas for his corpulent, elderly wife, alas for Mrs. Johnson! she was too substantial to be dissipated by the incantations of Anacreon or the reveries of Plato! Perhaps this is all imagination on our part. Perhaps there was nothing more like love for Johnson than she would have felt for the animated bust of Epictetus had it suddenly assumed life and corrected the translator's version. However, they lived in friendship for nearly half a century, that is, until Johnson's death in 1784. Some of our readers of the gentler sex will tell us that the airy tissue of Love could never be woven into the substantial fabric of a 46 years' friendship! Perhaps this is as proper a place as any to state that Elizabeth Carter was never married. Seriously, we have no idea of any stronger feeling than mutual regard between the author of Rasselas and the translator of Epictetus. That under other cir-enactment, there was sufficient congeniality of taste to have led to more tender sentiments, no one can question. That Mrs. Carter would have made a good wife, we have Johnson's own authority:

"Upon hearing a lady commended for her learning, Dr. Johnson said, 'A man is in general better pleased when he has a good dinner upon his table, than when his wife talks Greek. My old friend Mrs. Carter,' he added, 'could make a pudding as well as translate Epictetus from the Greek; and work a handkerchief as well as compose a poem.'"

Johnson as early as 1738 had been anxious that she should turn her learning to account, for Cave writes to Birch in that year:

"Mr. Johnson advises Miss C. to undertake a translation of Basilius de Cons. hominis there is profit and venue, and to put her name to it when published."

When a celebrated Greek scholar was spoken of, the doctor remarked, "Sir, he is the best Greek scholar in England, except ELIZABETH CARTER." It is not a little curious that the lady's translation of Crousas's Examen of Pope's Essay on Man was ascribed to Johnson. Boswell quotes an article from Dr. Birch's MSS. in the British Museum, which confirmed his opinion that his "guide, philosopher, and friend" was not the translator:

"Eliza Carter & P. D. Thomas Birch Verborum tuum Examini Crousasiano jam parati. Summam styli elegantiam, et in re difficilem proprietatem, admiratur. Dabam Novemb. 27, 1738." See Birch MSS., Brit. Mus., 6332.

As a linguist, Mrs. Carter was familiar to a greater or less degree with Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, French, and German.

Of the few numbers contributed to the Rambler, Nos. 44 and 190 are by Mrs. C. Eighteen years after their first introduction, Johnson writes with much gallantry to the lady:

"The name of Miss Carter introduces the memory of Cave. Four dear Cave! I loved him much; for to him I owe that I have known you."—Jan. 14, 1784.

Twenty-eight years later Johnson remarked at the Reveries Club:

"I dined yesterday at Mrs. Garrick's with Mrs. Carter, Miss Hannah More, and Fanny Burney. These such women are not to be found."

Thus comely and pleasant was that friendship which for nearly half a century nothing had broken; but Death accomplished what naught else could, and in a few months after the above was spoken, the "mourners went about the streets" for one of the greatest of philosophers and best of men. Mrs. Carter's testimony to his worth should have great weight with those petty cavillers who would question the excellence of an apostle, if he should happen to prove that he was not quite an angel also!

"I am by the papers that Dr. Johnson is dead. In extent of learning, and equable purity of moral writing, he has left no superior, and I fear very few equals. His virtues and his piety were founded on the standard of Christian principles and faith. His faith, I firmly believe, arose from the irradiation of a most suffering state of nervous constitution, which severely ever allowed him a moment's ease."—Letter to Mrs. Montagu.

Be it remembered that this is the testimony of one of the wisest of women and most devout of Christians. Let those who would be convinced of this—especially let all of that sex upon which she has conferred such undying honour—peruse the Memoirs of her Life by Mr. Pennington, (1807, 4to; 1806, 2 vols. 8vo.) and her Letters to Miss Talbot and Mrs. Vesey (1808, 2 vols. 4to; 1809, 4 vols. 8vo.) and to Mrs. Montagu, (1817, 3 vols. 8vo.) The following commendation from one of the most polished gentlemen of Europe will have far more weight than any thing which we can urge:

"Mrs. Carter's Correspondence pleases me very much, the purity and respectability of their lives, [Mrs. Carter and Mrs. Vesey], their unintermitted friendship, the elegance of their penmanship—form altogether an agreeable object of conversation."—SIR JAMES MACKENZIE.

So truly humble was the unobtrusive female whom the rank and genius of the land delighted to honour, that when Mr. Pennington, her nephew, told her of his design of writing some account of her life if he should survive her, she replied—"What can be said of so obscure an individual as I am? and what do you think the world will care about me?"

What a noble example does this excellent woman present for the emulation of her sex! We have occasionally in the course of this volume felt it our duty to stimulate the ambition of our female readers to the acquisition of something better than mere fashionable elegance, and nobler conquests than those afforded by the Opera or the Ball-room. The amelioration of the heart, the cultivation of the intellect, the visitation of the poor and wretched, the instruction of the ignorant, and the duties of devotion, surely have higher and holier claims upon immortal beings than the frivolities of fashion and the petty competitions of rivalry, where success is without honour, and pre-eminence entitled only to contempt.

Dr. Carter seems to have inclined to them, that was his late friend, Dr. B.; but he abounds with bad art and less common sense. We shall continue with an humble hint to the detractors of the Brunonian doctrine: a weak cause requires a strong advocate, but we have not observed that any very powerful champion hath yet entered the lists in favour of the opinions maintained by the late Dr. Brown."—*Lon. Carteret, John, Viscount Carteret and Earl Granville, 1690–1763, contributed to S. Buckley's 3d letter to Dr. Mead, respecting B.'s edit. of Thuanus, a character of that historian, (v. p. 21), and favoured Buckley with some useful hints concerning the enterprise. See BUCKLEY, SAMUEL, and CARTE, THOMAS.

Johnson excused his Letter on the Battle of Dettingen upon the plea of want of practice; and his lordship himself did not consider it a classical piece of composition, for he remarked, when he had finished it,

"Here is a letter expressed in terms not good enough for a tall-chandler to have used."

His lordship, however, had learning, if he lacked style, and turned it to profitable account in procuring MSS. for Dr. Bentley's use when urging him to undertake a new edition of Homer. In this connection, an anecdote occurs to us, too good to be omitted:

The great Bentley, who was known to old Lady Granville only as "the country clergyman," when in town would spend the evenings with Lord Carteret in classical conversations. On one occasion Lady Granville rebuked her son for having kept "the country clergyman" up the night before till he became intoxicated. His lordship denied that his friend was in such an unclerical condition. Lady Granville replied that "the clergyman could not have sung in so ridiculous a manner, unless he had been in liquor." "The truth was, that the singing thus mistaken by her ladyship, was Dr. Bentley's endeavour to instruct and entertain his noble friend by reciting Terence according to the true castilena of the ancients!"

Amidst his lordship's struggles for place and power, he had an affectation of saying—"I love my fireside." This gave rise to the amusing poetical satire by Hawkins Browne, entitled, The Fire-side; a Pastoral Soliloquy. He gave a copy of the Bible to a friend, who shortly after displayed it to him in an elegant binding. "You have done with it," said his lordship, "as the king has done with me: he made me fine, and he laid me by."

"Lord Granville had great parts, and a most uncommon share of learning for a man of quality. He was one of the best speakers in the House of Lords, both in the declamatory and the argumentative way.... His character may be summed up in nice precision, quick decision, and unbridled presumption."—LORD CHESTERFIELD.

Cartwright, Major John, 1740–1824, of the Royal Navy, and Major in the Nottinghamshire Militia, was a warm friend of the Independence of America, and refused to fight against her liberties. In 1774 he pub. American Independence the Glory and Interest of Great Britain; 2d edit., 1775. A list of his political pamphlets will be found in Watt's Bib. Brit. His Life and Correspondence by his niece are noticed above. He corresponded with a number of American gentlemen, and at home was an earnest advocate of annual parliaments and universal suffrage. The following eulogy upon his character from a distinguished source is worthy of quotation:

"He was one whose enlightened mind and profound constitutional knowledge placed him in the highest rank of public character, and whose purity of principle and consistency of conduct through life commanded the most respectful attention to his opinions."—CHARLES JAMES FOX.

Cartwright, Thomas, 1535?–1603, a celebrated Puritan divine, was a native of Hertfordshire. He was admitted of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1550, and in 1560 was chosen Fellow. In 1567 he commenced B.D., and in 1570 was chosen Lady Margaret Divinity Reader. His lectures gave great offence to Archbishop Grindal, who complained to Sir William Cecil, Chancellor of the University, that the students were "in danger to be poisoned with a love of contention and a liking of novelty." Dr. Whitgift also found fault, not only with his public statements, but also with "what he had uttered to him in private conference." He was forbidden to read any more lectures until further orders, and in 1571, when Dr. Whitgift became Vice-Chancellor of the University, Cartwright was deprived of his Professorship, and in 1572 his Fellowship was taken from him. He visited the Continent, where he remained for some years, and, returning, followed up Field and Wilcox's admonition to the Parliament by a Second Admonition for relief against the subscription required by the ecclesiastical commissioners, 1572. To this Dr. Whitgift pub. an answer the same year. Cartwright replied in 1573, and Whitgift responded in 1574, which last elicited two more publications from Cartwright in 1575 and 1577. To the disgrace of the government, he was several times imprisoned, and his health injured by confinement and bad treatment. An Admonition to the People of England, &c., Lon., 1589, 4to. His manner was not to keep any more money in his purse, but what might serve for charitable uses. He was very bountiful to poor scholars. Cartwright, Thomas, 1634–1689, supposed to be grandson to the preceding, was a native of Northampton. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, but was removed to Queen's College by the Parliamentary Visitors in 1649; Prebendary of Durham, 1672; Dean of Ripon, 1677; Bishop of Chester, 1686. He was one of the Commissioners in the attempt made by James II. to control the President and Fellows of Magdalen College. Sermons, Speech, &c., 1662–87.

"He became the most florid and seraphical preacher in the University.... His preaching was so graceful and profound, that none of his time or age went beyond him."—Allen. Oxon.

But he seems to have been unwilling to relinquish the society of the Muses. He pub. The Royal Slave; a Tragi-Comedy, Oxfr., 1639, 4to; 1640, 4to. To the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, 1641, fol. Comedies. Tragi-Comedies, with other Poems, 1641. Poemata Græca et Latina, and some other pieces. In 1643 he was chosen Junior Proctor of the University of Oxford, and Reader in Metaphysics, and died the same year of a malignant fever. An edit. of his Plays and Poems was pub. in 1651, 8vo, preceded by fifty copies of verses, highly eulogistic, from the chief literary characters of the day. Of this edit. some copies contain more matter than others. See Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon. Perhaps there is no instance in the annals of English literature of an author more admired by his contemporaries of distinction than Cartwright appears to have been. Indeed, he is now better known by the praises of others than by his own works. These, with the exception of his plays, which are now entirely neglected, consist principally of political addresses to distinguished characters of the day. We quote a few of the commendations which were showered so profusely upon Cartwright and his memory:

"Cartwright, rare Cartwright, to whom all must bow,
That was best preacher, and best poet too;
Whose learned fancy never was at rest,
But always labouring, yet labour'd least."—JOHN LEIGH.

"His style so pleases the judicious Gown,
As that there's something too for Wits o' th' town:
Rough-handed Critics do approve, and yet
'Tis treasure for the Ladies cabinet."—RALPH BAYNEST.

"My son Cartwright writes all like a man."—BEN. JONSON.

"He was another Tully and Virgil, as being most excellent for oratory and poetry, in which faculties, as also in the Greek tongue, he was so full and absolute, that those who knew him best, knew not in which he most excelled.... If the wits read his poems, divine his sermons, and philosophers his lectures on Aristotle's metaphysics, they would scarce believe that he died at a little above thirty years of age."—ANTHONY WOOD.

"He was extremely remarkable both for his outward and inward endowments,—his body being as handsome as his soul.... He was an excellent orator, and yet an admirable poet,—a quality which Cicero with all his pains could not attain to."—GERARD LANGBANE.

"We can safely recommend this work to all lovers of historical literature."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

Mr. Cary has edited new edita. of his father's Early French Poets, Lives of English Poets, and trans. of Dante, and also some of the works of Wm. CAREY, (q. v.)

Cary, Henry Francis, 1772–1844, a native of Birmingham, pub. at the age of 15 An Irregular Ode to General Elliott, Lon., 1787, 4to, and in the next year Sonnets and Odes, 1797, 4to. At 18 he was entered as a Commoner of Christ Church, Oxford; M.A., 1796; Vicar of Bromley's, Abbat's, 1797; assistant Librarian in the Brit. Museum, 1826. He was in receipt of a pension from the Government of £200 per year. Ode to General Kosciuszko, Lon., 1797, 4to. Inferno of Dante, with an English trans. in Blank Verse; Notes and Life of the Author, Lon., 1806, 22, fp. 8vo; 2d edit., with the Inferno, together with the Purgatorio and Paradiso, 1813, 3 vols. 32mo. A trans. of the Birds of Aristophanes and of the Odes of Pindar. New edit. of the trans. of Dante, revised by the translator's sons, 1847, p. 8vo. Lives of English Poets, from Johnson to Kirke White; designed as a continuation to Johnson's Lives, edited by Mr. C.'s son, Lon., 1846, 12mo. The Early

French Poets: a Series of Notices and Translations, edited and introduc. by Mr. Cary's son, Lon., 1847, 12mo.

The contents of the last two works were originally pub. anon. in the Old London Magazine. Mr. C. also edited the poetical works of Pope, Cowper, Milton, Thomson, and Young. In 1847 (2 vols. p. 8vo) his son, Rev. HENRY CARY, (q. v.) pub. Memoirs of the Rev. Henry Francis Cary: with his Literary Journal and Letters. Mr. C. was buried in Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey. His trans. of Dante cannot be too highly commended: its merits were perceived and brought to public attention by Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

"Of all the translators of Dante with whom we are acquainted, Mr. Cary is the most successful; and we cannot but consider his work as a great acquisition to the English reader. It is executed with a fidelity almost without example."—Edin. Review, No. 58.

"Mr. Cary's translation—the best we have ever read of any work."—Lon. Quarterly Review, July, 1823.

"Cary's version of Dante is universally allowed to be one of the most masterly productions of modern times."

"A translation of magnitude and difficulty, executed with perfect fidelity and admirable skill."—SOUTHEY.

With Cary's trans. and Flaxman's Designs, the reader may consider himself in possession of a treasure.

"Mr. Flaxman has translated Dante best, for he has translated it into the universal language of Nature."

As to the great poet himself, nothing need here be said:—let timid young poets beware of him, for

"Shelley always says, that reading Dante is unfavourable to writing, from its superiority to all possible compositions."—BROWN. "That wise poet of Florence, bight Dante —" CHAUCER.

Cary, Henry Lucius, third Viscount Falkland, was the only son of Lucius Cary, the great Lord Falkland, d. 1663, wrote The Marriage Night; a Play, Lon., 1664, 4to; erroneously ascribed by Wood to his lordship's son.

"Being brought early into the House of Commons, and a grave senator objecting to his youth, and to his not looking as if he had sowed his wild oats, he replied with great quickness, 'Then I am come to the properst place, where are so many geese to pick them up.'"—HORACE WALPOLE.

"He was a man of great abilities, and well versed in every kind of literature."—Douglas's Perceage.

"His quick and extraordinary parts and notable spirit performed much, and promised more."—Lynch's State Worthies.

"His play contains a great deal of true wit and satire."—Blag. Dramat.

"He was cut off in the prime of his years, and was as much missed when dead as beloved when living: being a person eminent for his extraordinary parts and heroic spirit."—Langbaine's Dram. Poets.

Cary, John, of Bristol. Treatises on Political Economy, Politics, and Trade, 1695–1745. Discourse on Trade and other Matters relative to it, Lon., 1745, 8vo.

"However little it deserved such an honour, this work was made the foundation of a French publication entitled Essai Sur L'Etat Du Commerce D'Angleterre, 2 vols. post 8vo, Paris, 1755.

"The latter, however, contains much additional matter, and is in all respects a more valuable work than that of Cary."—McOULLEN: Lib. Polit. Economy.

Cary, or Carey, John. New Itinerary through England, Wales, &c., Lon., 1798, 8vo; 10th edit., 1821, 8vo.

"A popular and highly useful work."—LOWMEYER.

Cary pub. several other topographical works, 1786–1801.

Cary, Lucius, second Viscount Falkland, b. about 1610, killed at the battle of Newbury, 1643, was a son of Henry, first Viscount Falkland. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and became distinguished for his uncommon proficiency in classical and general literature. His death at an early age in defence of his sovereign, was greatly lamented. Speeches, 1640, '41. Draft of a Speech of Episcopacy, 1644. Discourse upon the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, 1645, 4to. Holland, a Romish priest, answered this Discourse. A View of some Exceptions made against the Discourse on the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, Oxf., 1646, 4to. Discourse and Reply printed together, 1651, 4to; with T. White's Answer, Lon., 1660, 4to. A Letter to Mr. F. M., anno 1636; at the end of C. Gataker's Answer to Five Copious Questions, &c., 1673, 4to. His lordship also wrote some other pieces, poetical, &c.

Wood says that it was the current opinion of the University of Oxford, that Chillingworth and Falkland had such extraordinary clear reason, that if the great Turk or the Devil were to be converted, they were able to do it.

Horace Walpole, with his usual pertness, attempts to disparage the ardent eulogies with which Falkland's memory was honoured; but Horace was a much better judge of a Faenza Vase or a Poussin landscape than of the value of any historical testimony. Hear Lord Clarendon and other good judges:

"He was a person of such prodigious parts of learning and knowledge, of that inestimable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war than that single loss, it must be most infamous and execrable to all posterity."—History of the Rebellion.

"Lord Falkland's usual saying was—'I pity unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day.'"—LORD.

"He was the envy of this age, and will be the wonder of the next."—Triple's Epist. Dedic. before the Discourse of Infallibility; 1661.

"He was the greatest ornament to our nation that the last age produced."—Cressy's Epist. Apologetical, 1674.

"As for his parts, which speak him better than any elegy, they were incomparable, and needed no supplies of industry."—Athen. Oxon.

"A person of great wit, conspicuous for his natural perfections; in his printed writings there is an incomparable happy mixture of that great, beautiful, charming thing called wit."—Genuine Remains of Dr. Barlow, 1673.

We will conclude with Suckling's character of this noble writer:

"He was of late so gone with divinity,
That he had almost forgot his poetry,
Though to say the truth (and Apollo did know it)
He might have been both his priest and his poet."

"It is a most elaborate, learned, judicious, and pious work, containing a rich fund of critical and practical divinity."—Dr. E. Williams.

"This is the most ponderous of all the expositions which have been published on this part of Scripture. . . . It is impossible it can be useful, as no man can endure the fatigue of tolling through it. . . . While I do justice to the piety and feelings of the writer, I cannot approve of a mode of treating the word of God, which partakes more of enlumining than of exhibiting it."—ORME.

"This is one of the most profound astrological pieces that the world ever saw. The diagrams would probably have puzzled Euclid, though he had studied astrology. I have seen the doctor's head, parted into a parthia, amidst these strange diagrams, with the following motto:

"There's in the centre of his dark design;
Immediately after the unintelligible hieroglyphic inscribed 'Adam in Paradise,' in this passage, which I have inserted as a specimen of the work.

"Then Adam was created in that pleasant place Paradise, about the year before Christ 4000, viz. on April 24, at twelve o'clock, or midnight. Now, this place Paradise is in Mount Lebanon, where the pole is elevated 24 deg. 30 min. and the sun rises four hours sooner than under the elevation of the pole at London."—Graveyard's Day Book.

"The following authentic anecdote of Cas was communicated to me by the Rev. Mr. Gouting, in these terms:

"Dr. Maundy, formerly of Canterbury, told me, that, in his travels abroad, some eminent physician, who had been in England, gave him a token to spend at his return with Dr. Radcliffe and Dr. Cass. They dined on an evening, and were very merry when Dr. Radcliffe thus began a health: 'Here, brother Cass, to all the fools, your patients.' 'I thank you, good brother,' replied Cass, 'let me have all the fools, and you are heartily welcome to the rest of the party.'"—Graveyard's Day Book.

Cass, Lucilla J. B., a native of New Hampshire, is a daughter of Mr. Bartlett, and was married in 1838 to Mr. H. Cass. She is at present a resident of Cincinnati. Her contributions, both in prose and verse, to periodicals, "have been generally admired."—Woman's Record.

The "MSS. of the King's Library" were a part of the magnificent donation of George II. to the British Museum. It comprises the literary treasures collected by the sovereigns of England from the time of Henry VII. The magnificent library of George III., including 80,000 volumes, which cost his majesty £130,000, was also conferred upon the nation by George IV. The most important donation to the British Museum, with the above exception, was the library of the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville, containing 20,340 volumes, which cost upwards of £34,000, and would bring more money at the present period. See Sims's Handbook to the Library of the British Museum, Lon., 1854. October 9, 1782, at Exeter, New Hampshire, was called to the Bar in 1803; elected a member of the Ohio legislature in 1806; served in the war against England 1812-14; appointed Governor of Michigan 1813; which post he held until 1831, when he became Secretary of War, under General Jackson. In 1836 he was appointed minister to France, and discharged the duties of this important post until 1842, when he requested to be recalled. In 1848 he was a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, and received the electoral votes of half the States of the Union. In the hall of the Senate at Washington General Cass long held a commanding influence. In 1857 he was appointed Secretary of State of the United States. As a writer, he is entitled to no ordinary commendation. Specimens of his style and argumentative powers may be seen in his Inquiries respecting the History, Traditions, Languages, &c. of the Indians living within the United States, Detroit, 1823, 8vo, and in the Historical and Scientific Sketches of Michigan, delivered by General C. and Messrs. Castell, Edmund, 1606-1665, a native of Hatley, in Cambridgeshire, was entered of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, 1621, he afterwards removed to St. John's College for convenience of access to the library, in the preparation of his great work, the Lexicon Heptaglotton, Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, Samaritanum, Ethiopicum, Arabicum, conjugium, &c. Pericorum separatim, &c., Londini, 1660, 2 vols. fol. Some copies are dated 1658. This was intended as a companion to Bishop Walton's Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, Londini, 1657, 8 vols. fol. Castell assisted upon this work, also, and laid out more than £1000 upon it. His own Lexicon occupied him for eighteen years, and cost him more than £12,000, and when completed, it lay upon his hands as dead stock, with the exception of a few copies sold. He received some preferments, but nothing to compensate him for his time and expense. In 1666 he was made King's Chaplain, and Arabic Professor at Cambridge; in 1668, Prebendary of Canterbury. The vicarage of Hatfield, Essex, and subsequently the rectory of Wodeham Walter, were bestowed upon him. His last preferment was the rectory of Higham Gobion, Bedfordshire. He pub. some learned pieces, 1666, '67, 4to. About 500 copies, it is supposed, of his Lexicon were unsold at the time of his death. A melancholy fate was theirs! Hear the sad tale:

"There were placed by Mrs. Crisp, Dr. Castell's niece and executrix, in a room of one of her tenant's houses, at Martin, in Surrey, where, for many years, they lay at the mercy of the rats, who destroyed them in such a manner, that, on the lady's death, her executors could scarcely form one complete copy out of them. The whole load of burned rags sold for 27"—Sag. Brit.

It was a happy thing that the good old man never saw that sight!

To Dr. Lightfoot's assistance he was greatly indebted. Whilst preparing this work, Castell maintained in his own house and at his own expense seven Englishmen and seven foreigners as writers; all of whom died before the work was completed. His reference to his desolate situation and ill-requested labours at the end of the third page of the Preface, is truly affecting:

"Sicque quidem habui haec opus, et persequi tempestas mortis in illo amissionem, quodam in diebus, immensitate laboris plane extenuat. Per plures enim jam annos provectus, et una cum patrimonialis etiam computat, calculis etiam animi viribus, oculis diligentibus, corporis viribus in hoc opere summatim, et dissonis membris, relictis cum socia, sine unanimitate, sed vel corrumpere alio."

So industrious an author was Castell, that he informs us, "I considered that day so idle and dissatisfactory in which I did not tell sixteen or eighteen hours either of the Polyglot or Lexicon."

Mr. Diarrell, referring to Castell's end and experience, declares that "all the publishers of Polyglots have been ruined."

"Such were the melancholy circumstances under which the Lexicon of Castell was composed; a work which has long challenged the admiration, and defied the competition, of foreigners; and which, with the great Polyglot of Walton, its inseparable and invaluable companion, has raised an eternal monument of literary fame."—Dublin's Greek and Latin Classics.

"It is probably the greatest and most perfect work of the kind ever performed by human industry and learning."—Dr. Clarke.

"Mr. Catlin is the historian of the Red Races of mankind; of a past world, or at least of a world fast passing away, leaving hardly a trace or wreck behind. Eight years has he devoted to this memorable task, and with his pen and pencil has brought the existence of these wild and uncivilized beings so vividly before our eyes, that we seem to have accompanied him in his wanderings, seen them, mixed with them, and impressed the recollection of their forms and features, their costumes, strange customs, feasts, ceremonies, religious rites, wars, dances, sports, and other modes of life, distinctly upon our minds. And it is impossible not to be led away by his devoted enthusiasm, and feel, like himself, a deep concern for these remaining children of the prairie and the forest, the last fragment of dying nations, and, with all the errors of their condition, a splendid variety of the genus Man."—*Lon. "Throughout the whole work, the Editor, keeping in view the class of persons for whom it is especially intended, has studiously aimed at delicacy of language and sentiment."

Cave, Edward, 1691-1754, the projector of The Gentleman's Magazine, and foster-father of many poor authors, can claim a place amongst the class whom he so nobly befriended. He wrote an Account of Criminals, and was employed by the Company of Stationers to correct the Gradus ad Parnassum. As the founder of that invaluable periodical—to which this volume is deeply indebted—The Gentleman's Magazine—he is entitled to lasting honour. The first number was issued in January, 1731, and Johnson, writing in 1754, (see his Life of Cave, in Gent. Mag. for February,) remarks,

"It has now subsisted three and twenty years, and still continues equally to enjoy the favour of the world."

We, writing one hundred years later, (i. e. in 1854,) can repeat the latter clause of the paragraph. The whole series to the present time, about 220 volumes, (now at our side,) should be in the library of every student of English literature or political history. We are glad to see that the present proprietors announce their intention of continuing this work till "Time shall be no longer." If the "Last Man" should inherit part, and take the rest, of the series, he will (to use the bookseller's phrase) "need no other Library!" It is probably known to the reader, that in the commencement of Dr. Johnson's literary career, he drew his chief means of support from his contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine.

"The Gentleman's Magazine, begun and carried on by Mr. Edward Cave, under the name of Sylvanus Urban, had attracted the notice and esteem of Johnson, in an eminent degree, before he came to London as an adventurer in literature. He told me that when he first saw St. John's Gate, the place where that deservedly popular miscellany was originally printed, he beheld it with reverence."

Cave treated the needy young author with great kindness. He little thought that the highest honour which would attach to his name would be the fact of this then obscure contributor's becoming his biographer. See Johnson's Life of Cave, and Boswell's Johnson.

The publisher devoted himself to the prosperity of his magazine with a zeal seldom equalled:

"Cave never looked out of his window but with a view to the Gentleman's Magazine. . . . He used to sell ten thousand; yet such was then his minute attention and anxiety that the sale should not suffer the smallest decrease, that he would name a particular person who he heard had talked of leaving off the Magazine, and would say 'Let us have something good next month.'"
—DR. JOHNSON.

It is interesting in this connexion to remark, that after the death of Edward Cave, in 1754, The Gentleman's Magazine was continued by David Henry, Edward Cave's brother-in-law, and R. Cave. David Henry was connected with this periodical until his death, in 1792, having "for more than half a century taken an active part in the management of the Gentleman's Magazine." In 1778 John Nichols—a name which we never mention or write without emotions of respect and affection—obtained a share in the Magazine, and rendered it more valuable than at any period of its former history. Edmund Burke entitled it "one of the most chaste and instructive miscellanies of the age;"—Dr. Warton wrote to Nichols—"under your guidance it is become one of the most useful and entertaining miscellanies I know;"—and Edward Gibbon urged him to make a selection for future reference from its overflowing pages. On the death of Mr. Nichols, in 1826, the magazine descended to his son—the surviving partner—and the last number, i. e. for October, 1854, bears the imprimatur of John Bowyer Nichols and Sons—directly under the venerable Gate of St. John's. It has been in one family about fourscore years; and may the Nicholises "live a thousand years," and issue the Gentleman's Magazine "punctually on the first of every month!"

We need not apologize for this scrap of literary genealogy. They who are wise, and yet lack the Gentleman's Magazine, will forthwith procure the whole series ab initio, if they can—and if not, they will procure what they can of the back volumes, and commence their subscriptions with the next number. Henry Wharton assisted in this work, and a controversy was thereby elicited, (v. n. in Chalmers's Biog. Diet.)

Bishop Watson observes that Casimiri Oudini Commentarius de Scripturis Ecclesiæ, &c., Leipzig, 1722, 3 vols. fol., is a kind of supplement to Cave's Historia Literaria, and other works of the same kind.

"Dr. Cave's other works are all inferior to this, which is his capital performance. It discovers great reading, research, and accuracy. It contains much important information, in comparatively little room. It is highly praised by Walch, and was reprinted at Geneva in 1705 and 1720. It occasioned a controversy with Le Clerc, [Epistola Apologetica, &c., 1700, 8vo.] which produced the correction of several mistakes in the first edition. On this account the latter editions are the best."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Cavendish, Charles, Lord. His Case, 1759, fol.

Cavendish, George, of Glemsford. The Negotiations of Woolsey, the Great Cardinal of England, &c. Composed by one of his own servants, being his Gentleman-Usher, Lon., 1641; reprinted as The Life and Death of Thomas Woolsey in 1667, 12mo, and 1706, 8vo, and in the Harleian Miscellany. This version is incorrect. A faithful transcript from MSS. was pub. by Dr. Wordsworth in his Ecclesiastical Biography, 1810, 6 vols. 8vo; 4th edit., 1839, enlarged. See Cavendish's Life of Woolsey in this collection. This biography was formerly attributed to Sir William Cavendish, the founder of the House of Devonshire. That his brother George was really the author, is satisfactorily proved by the Rev. Joseph Hunter, of Bath, in his pamphlet Who wrote Cavendish's Life of Woolsey? 1814, 8vo. 100 copies printed. It was reprinted in Cavendish's Life, with notes and illustrations, edited by Mr. Singer, 1827, 8vo.

"All the memorials of such a man are, of course, worthy of being preserved, and in achieving this object, Mr. Singer is entitled to our praise and gratitude."—Lon. Critical Gazette.

"The pen of Cavendish is a lively and a ready one, and all that came under his own observation he describes with fidelity and accuracy. His style has the unstudied grace of a man writing in earnest; and when it rises, as it frequently does, in denouncing the blind caprice of chance, the degeneracy of the times, or the neglect of obscure worth, it often possesses a dignity and impressive eloquence which marks a lofty and intellectual spirit. . . . But what adds to the value of this production is, that there is nowhere a more vivid or striking representation of the manners of that distant age." See this excellent article in the Lon. Retrospective Review, v. 1, 1822.

"There is a sincere and impartial adherence to truth, a reality in Cavendish's narrative, which bespeaks the confidence of his readers, and very much increases his pleasure." See Singer's Metrical Visions, by Cavendish.

Cavendish, Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire. The Passage of the Mountain of St. Gothard, Lon., 1802, 8vo.

Cavendish, Hon. Henry, 1730-1810, younger son of Lord Charles Cavendish, and grandson of the Duke of Devonshire, was a chemist of great eminence. He lived a secluded life, engaged in his experiments, never married, and left a million pounds sterling to his heirs. The results of many of his experiments will be found in the Phil. Trans., 1766, '69, '71, '76, '83, '90, '92, '98, 1809. Cavendish ranks among the first of chemical philosophers. But this is a subject upon which the learned may claim to speak:

"Cavendish est un des savants qui ont le plus contribué aux progrès de la chimie moderne. C'est lui qui, le premier, analysa les propriétés particulières du gaz hydrogène, et assigna les caractéristiques qui distinguent ce gaz de l'air atmosphérique. C'est à lui que l'on doit la fameuse découverte de la composition de l'eau. . . . Cavendish ne s'est pas moins distingué dans la physique en y portant la même esprit d'exactitude. Il était aussi très versé dans la haute géométrie, et il en a fait une détermination de la densité moyenne de notre globe."—Bior. Voyez Biographie Universelle.

"Mr. Cavendish was a profound mathematician, electrician, and chemist. Dr. Black, who had discovered carbonic acid, laid the foundation of pneumatic chemistry. Cavendish is usually said to have discovered hydrogen, (although it was prepared by Mayow, Boyle, and Hales, long anteriorly,) and placed the second stone on the great superstructure which was afterwards to be raised by Priestley and others. That common air consisted of oxygen and nitrogen was known; but Cavendish demonstrated (1783) that it consisted of a volume of 20-833 oxygen, and 79-166 nitrogen—a result which has been thoroughly confirmed by subsequent experiments. He likewise demonstrated the exact constitution of water, although it is confidently affirmed that James Watt at the same time knew its composition, and that his views were known to Cavendish. Cavendish likewise showed that nitric acid is composed of nitrogen and oxygen—Priestley having previously found that electric sparks, when passed through air, turned litmus red. Cavendish added potash to the solution evaporated, and obtained nitre. While there is scarcely any doubt that there has been a tendency to overrate Cavendish at the expense of others, he must be always ranked as one of the first of English Chemists, who has, by the accuracy of his experiments, assisted in laying the sure foundation of the science."—ROBT. DUNDAS THOMSON, M.D. F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry, St. Thomas's Hospital College, London. See Rich's Cyc. of Biog., 1854.

The following opinion of an eminent authority and unexceptionable judge in the premises must not be omitted: "Cavendish was possessed of a minute knowledge of most of the departments of Natural Philosophy; he carried into his chemical researches a delicacy and precision which have never been exceeded; possessing depth and extent of mathematical knowledge, he reasoned with the caution of a geometer upon the results of his experiments; and it may be said of him, what perhaps can be scarcely said of any other person, that whatever he accomplished was perfect at the moment of its production. His processes were all of a finished nature; executed by the hand of a master, they required no correction: the accuracy and beauty of his earliest labours have remained unimpaired amidst the progress of discovery, and their merits have been illustrated by discussion, and exalted by time."—SIR HUMPHRY DAVY: Chemical Philosophy.

Cavendish, Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle, d. 1673, was as fond of authorship as her noble lord proved himself to be. Lord Orford speaks disparagingly of her ladyship's talents, but it is well known that Horace Walpole spared no man (or woman) in his humour. Philosophical Fancies, Lon., 1653, 12mo. In one of her last productions, her ladyship, with commendable frankness, avows a most ungovernable cacothès scribendi:

"I imagine all those who have read my former books will say I have writ enough, unless they were better; but my what you will, it pleaseth me, and since my delights are harmless, I will satisfy my humour."

"For had my brain as many ankles in't To fill the world, I'd put them all in print; No matter whether they be well or ill express'd, My will is done, and that pleases woman best."

Most of his writings were printed in an Appendix to the Memoirs of the Cavendishes by Dr. Kennett. "As a poet he displays considerable variety of power, but perhaps he is rather to be placed among the ethical versifiers, than ranked with those who have attempted with success the higher flights of genius. It is gratifying to perceive, that these branches of biblical literature are again reviving in both parts of the island."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Wood acknowledges that Hurst's eulogy on Cawton was well deserved.

Caxton, William, 1412?–1492, a native of the Weald of Kent, is entitled to the lasting gratitude of posterity as the introducer of the art of printing into England. At the age of 15 he was apprenticed to a mercer in London, Robert Large, created Lord Mayor in 1439, who, on his death in 1441, left his apprentice the handsome legacy of 34 marks. Caxton left home for the Continent in 1442, acting according to most authorities as commercial agent for the Mercers' Company of London. Mr. Oldys remarks:

"It is agreed on by those writers who have best acquainted themselves with his story, he was deputed and intrusted by the Mercers' Company to be their agent or factor in Holland, Zealand, Flanders, &c., to establish and enlarge their correspondence, negotiate the consumption of our own, and importation of foreign, manufactures, and otherwise promote the advantage of the said corporation in their respective merchandises." Vide CAXTON in Biog. Brit.

Upon this Mr. Knight comments:

"This indeed is a goodly commission, if we can make out that he received such. . . . The real fact is, that for twenty of those years in which Caxton describes himself as residing in the countries of Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, there was an absolute prohibition on both sides of all commercial intercourse between England and the Duchy of Burgundy, to which these countries were subject; and for nearly the whole period, no English goods were suffered to pass to the continent except through the town of Calais, and 'in France,' says Caxton, 'I was never.'"—Knight's Life of Caxton, Lon., 1844, 32mo.

In 1464 Edward the Fourth appointed Richard Whitehill and William Caxton, still abroad, to be his ambassadors and deputies to the Duke of Burgundy, for the "purpose of confirming an existing treaty of commerce, or, if necessary, for making a new one." In 1466 a treaty was concluded, by which the commercial relations between the two countries, which had been interrupted for twenty years, were restored. Margaret, sister of Edward IV. of England, was married to Charles, Duke of Burgundy, in 1468 at Bruges, and Caxton, who was then residing in this city, received an appointment—it is not known in what capacity—in the court of the duchess. He became a great favourite with this noble lady, and in the course of conversation she elicited from Caxton an acknowledgment that "having no great charge or occupation," he had before her grace's arrival commenced the translation from French into English of the "Recuyell of the Histories of Troye"—(by Raoul le Fèvre) "for to pass therewith the time." Discouraged with the difficulties attendant upon his task, he had abandoned it; but his noble mistress made him go for his "five or six quires," and submit them to her inspection, and then "commanded me straightly to continue, and make an end of the residue then not translated. Whose dreadful commandment I durst in no wise disobey."

"The translation was begun in Bruges, the 1st of Marche, in the yere 1468, continued in Gaunt, and finished in Colon, the 19th of September, 1471." He then "deliberated in himself to take the labour in hand of printing it together with the third book of the Destruction of Troye, translated of late by John Lydgate, a monk of Burye, in English ritual."

The book was printed; but being sine anno et loco, the place has been a matter of dispute. Perhaps there is little risk of error in assigning Cologne as the city where, and 1476 as the year in which, this first book in the English language saw the light. It has been agreed by many authorities that Caxton had previously printed in the Low Countries the original Récueil des Histoires de Troye, (in 1467,) and a Latin Speech by Russell, ambassador of Edward IV. to Charles of Burgundy, (in 1469.) Mr. Knight joins issue with Dibdin, Bryant, Hallam, and others upon this point, and to their works we must refer the curious reader. Caxton is supposed to have returned to England about 1474, this being the date of the Game and Play of the Chess, which is presumed to be the first book ever printed in England. Authorities, however, are much at variance in this matter. Raoul le Fèvre's Récueil des Histoires de Troye in the French, is by some presumed to be Caxton's first issue in England. Some of his earliest impressions are without date. We have already referred to the bold assertion of Richard Atkyns, that Frederick Corseilis had published a book in England in 1468. (Vide ATKYNS, RICHARD.) We need not linger upon a story the details of which never obtained much credence. We now behold the father of English printing installed in his printing-office in Westminster Abbey, and assiduously labouring to extend the benefits of the new invention to his grateful countrymen. He was one of the most industrious and indefatigable of men, and literally "died in the harness," for (although he printed nothing after 1490) it is believed that he spent some hours of the last day of his life in translating for the press Vita Patrum, or "The rights devout and solitary life of the ancient or old holy fathers, hermits, dwellings in the deserts." He left this world in May or June, 1492, after having zealously served his generation.

"Exclusively of the labours attached to the working of his press as a new art, our typographer contrived, though well stricken in years, to translate not fewer than five thousand closely printed folio pages. As a translator, therefore, he ranks among the most laborious, and, I would hope, not the least successful, of his tribe. The foregoing conclusion is the result of a careful enumeration of all the books translated as well as printed by him; which, [the translated books,] if published in the modern fashion, would extend to nearly twenty-five octavo volumes!"—Dibdin's Typographical Antiquities, q. v. See Biog. Brit.; Knight's Life of Caxton; Life of Caxton, pub. by Soc. for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

All of Caxton's impressions are now very valuable. A copy of his first book, and the first printed in English, which had belonged to Elizabeth Grey, Queen of Edward IV., produced in the Roxburghe sale, (6350,) £1060 18s. This is of course no criterion of the value of ordinary copies; but an imperfect one of the same work brought at the Lloyd sale, (1469,) £126, and a copy of the Chronicles of England was sold by Leigh and Sotheby in 1815 for £105. The number of books printed by Caxton was sixty-four, and we cannot add any thing of more value to this article, than a list of the whole, extracted from Dibdin's Typographical Antiquities, Lon., 1810-19, 4 vols. 4to.

Cecil, Sir Edward. Speech in Parliament, 1621, 4to. Cecil, Henry Montague. The Mysterious Visitor; or May, the Rose of Cumberland; a Novel, 1805, 2 vols.

Cecil, Richard, 1748-1810, a native of London, was entered of Queen's College, Oxford, in 1773; ordained Deacon, 1776; Priest, 1777; Minister of St. John's, Bedford Row, London, 1780; presented to the livings of Chobham and Bisley, in Surrey, 1800. Mr. C. was distinguished as a preacher, and for his skill in music and painting. Life of Hon. and Rev. W. B. Cadogan, 1798; of John Bacon, the sculptor, 1801; of Rev. John Newton, 2d edit., 1808. These biographies are contained in vol. i. of the edit. of his Works, (edited by Rev. Joseph Pratt,) in 4 vols. 8vo, 1811; vol. ii. contains his Miscellaneous and Practical Tracts; vol. iii. his Sermons; vol. iv. his Remains. He pub. a Selection of Psalms and Hymns for the Public Worship of the Church of England, of which the 32d edit. was pub. before 1840. In 1839 a vol. of his Sermons, then first collected, was issued; new edit., 1853, 12mo. An edit. of his Works, ed. by Mr. Pratt, appeared in 1838, 2 vols. 8vo; and his Original Thoughts, edited by Catherine Cecil; 2d ed., 1851, p. 8vo. Some of his original melodies will be found in Theophania Cecil's Psalm and Hymn Tunes, and a number of his letters and remarks in the Memoir of Mrs. Hawkes.

"Cecil was a man deservedly distinguished among the evangelical clergymen of the established Church."—BISHOP JENK.

"Remarkably original: with striking and judicious views. His Remains, eminently useful to ministers, and perhaps one of the most valuable books that has been given to them in modern times."—BICKERSTETH.

"Cecil's style of preaching partook largely of his characteristic excellence. . . . His ideas, like the rays of the sun, carried their own light with them. Images and illustrations were at his command, and rendered his discourses not only instructive but fascinating. They were living pictures."

"In Richard Cecil we see a man combining the rich soil of native talent with a refinement of cultivation not surpassed by classic example; while in him the elegant and profound scholar and polished gentleman are only the subordinate characters of the humble-minded, devoted, and enterprising follower of the lowly Jesus."—BAPTIST APOLOGET.

"His style of preaching was original and striking, acutely scrutinizing, richly embodied with evangelical statements, and bearing pointedly upon the experience of the Christian."—Lon. Christian Observer.

"He was evidently a man of quicker parts, and a more spirited writer and speaker, than his father."—DR. BISHOP.

"To be great men were glad of poets; now
I, not the worst, am covetous of thee;
Yet dare not to my thought least hope allow
Of adding to thy fame: thine may to me,
When in my book men read but Cecil's name."

Cecil, William, Lord Burleigh, Lord High Treasurer of England, 1520-1598, was prime minister for more than half a century. He was entered of St. John's College, Cambridge, May 27, 1535, and speedily distinguished himself by his proficiency in his studies. As regards his subsequent career we may adopt the words of Lord Orford. Burleigh's is "One of those great names better known in the annals of his country, than in those of the republic of letters. In the latter right only it is the business of this work to record him."—R. & N. Authors.

A review of Haynes's and Murdin's collection of Cecil's State Papers will be found in Retrospect. Review, N. S., i. 204-30; 419-36, (1827.) In 1828-31 a most important work was given to the world by the Rev. Dr. Nares, Regius Professor of Modern Hist. in the University of Oxford; viz., Memoirs of the Life and Administration of Cecil, Lord Burleigh, containing a Hist. View of the Times in which he lived, and of the illustrious Persons with whom he was connected; now first pub. from the originals, 3 vols. 4to. No man should pretend to dogmatize upon the events of Elizabeth's reign who has not digested these quartos.

"A publication of the highest national interest, and a great and valuable accession to our knowledge of English history, at a period when that history is most important. . . . In his preface Dr. Nares tells us that he found that he had done but little when he had carefully read and examined more than fifty-nine thousand closely printed pages for one volume alone. It is by such indefatigable researches that he has been enabled to correct many errors in Rapin, Strype, Neale, Lingard, and others."—Lon. Athenaeum.

"This elaborate and sterling work appears in the good old solid form of nearly 800 pages to the volume. As it would be impossible, in a journal like ours, to afford any adequate idea of the multitude of great historical, biographical, religious, and political questions which are embraced and discussed in a work of such magnitude, we must here take leave of it, and content ourselves with again recommending it on its intrinsic merits as a work of great historical value."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"Both public depositories and private collections have been consulted with all the ardour that the magnitude and importance of the work required."—Lon. Gen. Mag.

She was thrice married:—1st to a nephew of Sir Stephen Fox; 2dly to Colonel Carroll; and 3dly to Joseph Centlivre, principal cook to Queen Anne. She sometimes appeared upon the stage, but was more successful as a composer. Her wit, beauty, and accomplishments made her a favourite in the literary circles presided over by Steele, Budgell, Rowe, &c. Her Works, with a New Account of her Life, appeared in 1761, 3 vols. 12mo. A list of her 19 plays—among which A Bold Stroke for a Wife and the Perjured Husband—will be found in the Biog. Dramatic.

"We cannot help giving it as our opinion, that if we do not allow her to be the very first of our female writers for the stage, she has but one above her, and may justly be placed next to her predecessor in dramatic glory, the great Mrs. Behn."—Biog. Dramat.

Ceolfird, or Ceolfirth, 642?-716, succeeded Benedict Biscop in 690 as Abbot of Wearmouth. His letter addressed to the King of the Picts on the observance of Easter, has been highly commended.

Chalkhill, John, is a name prefixed by Isaac Walton to a work pub. by him in 1683, entitled Thealma and Clearchus: A Pastoral History in smooth and easie verse. Walton speaks of Chalkhill as the Friend and "Acquaintance of Edmund Spenser," but as there is no other evidence of the existence of such a friend of the author of the Faery Queen, (for the Winchester Cathedral Chalkhill cannot be the poet wanted,) some critics have considered Chalkhill as only a nom de plume, and believe Walton to be the author of the Pastoral History. See this question discussed in Mr. Singer's reprint of Thealma and Clearchus in an article in the Lon. Retrospective Review, iv. 230, 1821, and in Beloe's Anecdotes, i. 69–74. Those who have confidence in Isaac's veracity, when they read the following positive assertions, may feel inclined to range themselves on the side of Chalkhill believers:

"He was in his time a man generally known, and as well beloved; for he was humble and obliging in his behaviour; a gentleman, a scholar, very innocent and prudent; and, indeed, his whole life was useful, quiet, and virtuous."

"The versification of Thealma and Clearchus is extremely sweet and equable. Occasionally harsh lines and unlicensed rhymes occur; but they are only exceptions to the general style of the poem,—the errors of haste or negligence."—Lon. Retrop. Rev. 1821.

He came to London about 1777, and found literary employment as a contributor to St. James's Chronicle, The Morning Chronicle, The Morning Herald, and the Critical and Analytical Reviews. In 1809 he pub. an edition of Shakspeare with Hist. and Explanatory Notes from the most eminent Commentators, &c.; from Steevens, &c.; again, 1812 and 1845, 8 vols. 8vo.

We quote an opinion without comment:

"This is, unquestionably, the most desirable edition for all who desire to enjoy their author, without having their attention drawn from him every moment to the petty squabbles of his parasitical commentators."

"No good library can possibly be considered complete without the excellent Biographical Dictionary of Chalmers."

"The most extensive and important body of Biographical and Bibliographical information ever published in this country."

This work is now (1854) worth £7 to £10, according to the binding and condition.

Among the last labours of Mr. C. were an abridgment of Todd's Johnson Dictionary, in 1820; the 9th edit. of Boswell's Johnson, in 1822, and a new edit. of Shakspeare, and one of Dr. Johnson's works, in 1823. In addition to the labours noticed by us, he edited the works of Fielding, Gibbon, Bolingbroke, Pope, &c., wrote many biographical sketches, and assisted in a number of literary undertakings. For particulars see Lon. Gent. Mag., Feb. 1835.

"Mr. Chalmers was most indefatigable and laborious in his studies and devotion to literature. No man ever edited so many works for the bookellers of London; and his attention to accuracy of collation, his depth of research as to facts, and his discrimination as to the character of the authors under his review, cannot be too highly praised."—*Lon. Chalmers, David. See CHAMBERS.

Chalmers, George, 1742–1825, a native of Fochabers, Scotland, was educated at King's College, Old Aberdeen. After devoting some time to the study of the law, he emigrated to Maryland, and practised in the colonial courts for ten years. The American struggle for independence, to which he was opposed, proving successful, he returned to England, and his loyalty was rewarded in 1786 by a clerkship in the board of trade, which he retained until his death. He pub. a number of political, historical, biographical, and miscellaneous works, some of which we notice. A Collection of Treaties between Great Britain and other Powers, Lon., 1750, 2 vols. 8vo; and 1790. Political Annals of the Present United Colonies, Book 1, to 1688, 1780, 4to; all published. Repub., with addits., Introduc. to the Hist., &c., Bost., 1845, 2 vols. 8vo.

"You will sometimes see the work of Chalmers referred to. It is an immense, heavy, tedious book, to explain the legal history of the different colonies of America. It should be consulted on all such points. But it is impossible to read it. The leaves, however, should be turned over, for curious particulars often occur, and the nature of the first settlement and original laws of each colony should be known. The last chapter, indeed, ought to be read. The right to tax the colonies became a great point of dispute. Chalmers means to show that the sovereignty of the British Parliament existed over America, because the settlers, though emigrants, were still English subjects and members of the empire."—*Prof. Smyth's Lect. on Mod. Life of Mary, Queen of Scots, from the State Papers, 2d edit., 1822, 3 vols. 8vo. A valuable history.

Mr. C.'s great work, to which much of his life was devoted, was a comprehensive topographical and historical account of Great Britain, from the earliest times—styled Caledonia. Of the four volumes projected, only three appeared—the result of vast labour and research—Vol. i., 1807; ii., 1810; iii., 1824; all 4to. The concluding portion was left by the indefatigable author in MS.

"The Caledonia is to the Anglo-Saxon History what Stonehenge is to a carved front in an old cathedral. It is one of the children of Anak. In deep research and heaping together of matter, the Britannia of Camden fades away before it. A life, and a long and busy one, was almost exclusively devoted to this stupendous work: the author lived to complete it, and no more. The concluding volume is still in manuscript; and no bookseller has appeared willing to hazard the expense of giving to the world a thousand pages quarto. This is one of those cases in which literature is not its own reward; and had Chalmers lived in any land under the sun save this, his Caledonia would have been published by the government, and the learned author pensioned."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Lit. of the Last Fifty Years.

"It is impossible to speak too highly of the excellencies of this elaborate work—more elaborate, indeed, and copious, more abounding with original information, than any work in British History or Antiquities which ever came from one author. It will rank with the immortal BUTANNIA OF CAMDEN, which it far surpasses in industry of research and accumulation of matter."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

Chalmers, Thomas, D.D., LL.D., and member of the Royal Institute of France, 1780–1847, the most eminent Scottish divine of his day, was a native of Anstruther, Fifeshire.

He entered the University of St. Andrew's in 1791. Selecting the ministry as his profession, he was ordained in the Church of Scotland, and officiated as assistant minister in the parish of Cavers, from whence he removed to Kilmany, in Fifeshire, and in 1814 to the Tron Church of Glasgow, where he speedily became celebrated as the most eloquent preacher of his day. The article Christianity, contributed to Sir David Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopædia, and since pub. in book form, added to the evidences of the writer's eminent abilities. In 1817 he pub. his Discourses on Astronomy; in 1818 his Commercial Discourses; in 1819 and 1820 appeared the Occasional Discourses, and in 1821 (1821–26, 3 vols. 8vo) he gave to the world The Civic and Christian Economy of Large Towns. Mr. McCulloch thus notices this work:

"Dr. Chalmers is a zealous, or rather a fanatical, opponent of poor-laws. His projects for providing for the support of the poor, without resorting to a compulsory provision, which he regards as one of the greatest possible evils, are developed in this work. But while we admit the goodness of his intentions, nothing, as it appears to us, can be more futile and visionary than his schemes; more inconsistent with principle, experience, and common sense."—Lit. of Polit. Economy.

In 1824 he was appointed to the Professorship of Moral Philosophy in the University of St. Andrew's. Whilst thus settled he pub. his works on Endowments, his Bridge-water Treatise, the Lectures on the Romans, and his Political Economy in connexion with the Moral State and Moral Prospects of Society, (Glasgow, 1832, 8vo.) This work also incurs the censure of the celebrated critic whom we have just quoted:

"The principles which pervade the work are mostly borrowed from the Economists and Mr. Malthus; and are frequently either wholly unsound, or carried to such an extreme as to become inapplicable and absurd. It, however, contains some ingenious disquisitions. It was reviewed in the Edinburgh Review, (vol. lvi. pp. 52–72.) Dr. Chalmers replied to the reviewers in a pamphlet, in which he ineffectually endeavoured to vindicate his doctrines from the objections urged against them."—McCulloch's Lit. of Pol. Economy.

In 1828 he was removed to the Chair of Theology in the University of Edinburgh, "the highest academical distinction which could be bestowed."

Dr. Chalmers was the principal leader of the seceding party in the difficulties which resulted in the disruption of the Church of Scotland in 1843. Resigning his professor's chair in the University of Edinburgh, he was elected principal and primarius Professor of Theology to the seceding body. The degree of LL.D. conferred by the University of Oxford, and election as a corresponding member of the Royal Institute of France—"honours never before accorded to a Presbyterian divine, and seldom to a Scotsman"—are striking evidences of the esteem in which this eminent man was held by the most learned judges of literary merit. On the evening of Sunday, May 30, 1847, Dr. Chalmers retired to rest "apparently in perfect health, and died calmly during the night, the bed-clothes being found undisturbed about his person." He left a widow and six children—one married to the Rev. Dr. Hanna of Stirling, an author and editor of the North British Review, who has since pub. Dr. C.'s posthumous works, and Memoirs of his Life and Writings. See Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1847, to which we are indebted for many of the above facts. The writings of Dr. C. were pub. by Messrs. Thomas Constable & Co., Edinburgh, in the following order:

Posthumous Works; edited by the Rev. Dr. Hanna, 9 vols. 8vo., 1847–49.

Daily Scripture Readings, 3 vols.

Sabbath Scripture Readings, 2 vols.

Sermons Illustrative of Different Stages in His Ministry, 1 vol.

"This volume of the Posthumous Works of the great Scottish divine has a distinct utility of its own. These discourses extend over a period of nearly fifty years; they mark the ripening of a mind originally fertile, and the perfecting of an eloquence forcible from its earliest effort; but they are still more interesting to the minister and the religious inquirer, as showing not an education but a regeneration of the spiritual nature; not a completion, but a reformation, of belief on the great evangelical articles of our faith."—Walsman.

Institutes of Theology, 2 vols.

"In 1841 Dr. Chalmers commenced rewriting and remoulding his Theological Lectures into the form of a complete and comprehensive Treatise on Systematic Divinity. To this work all his leisure time was given. None of his published writings received larger, if so large, a measure of the author's care and thought in their preparation. He looked forward to it himself, when completed, as his largest and most matured contribution to the science of theology; and he has left it nearly in the state in which he designed to present it to public notice."

"A work worthy of the veteran theologian and preacher whose masculine yet child-like mind lives in its pages. For the spirit it breathes, still more than for the views of truth it exhibits, we desire that it may be widely studied among our young preachers and theological students."—Putrid.

Prolections on Butler's Analogy, &c., 1 vol.

"Never did Calvinism appear to greater advantage than in these Prolections. We refer not so much to the victorious argument that is wielded in its defence, as to the life our professor breathes into it, and the life that he draws from it. How often is the Edwardian Calvinism of the North defended as a system scientifically correct, and the argument left there! But the volume before us may convince any one that, rightly interpreted, and savingly experienced—understood in all its parts, and seen in all its relations, it is not more a system of orthodoxy than a source of godliness."—Journal of Prophecy.

"To commend these works is superfluous; they have met with universal approbation from the British press and public. That the periodical press, representing so great a variety of religious and political opinions, should have so generally noticed them, and that too with high commendation, is a circumstance exceedingly rare, if not unparalleled. They have charms for the merely literary man, and they will obtain a hearing for evangelical truth, in quarters from which it would otherwise be excluded."—Kitt's Journal: Notice of the Posthumous Works.

In addition to the above, the reader must procure Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Dr. Chalmers. By his son-in-law, the Rev. Wm. Hanna, LL.D., 4 vols. 8vo, 1849-52.

"Dr. Hanna is to be congratulated on the manner in which he has fulfilled the important task on which he has now for several years been engaged. Dr. Chalmers is a man whose life and character may well engage many writers; but no one possessed such materials as Dr. Hanna for writing a biography so full and detailed as was in this case demanded. The four volumes which he has laid before the public are not only an ample discharge of his special obligations as regards his splendid subject, but also a much-needed example of the manner in which biographies of this kind, combining original narrative with extracts from writings and correspondence, ought to be written."—Lon. Athenæum.

"We find that throughout this article, we have been serving Dr. Hanna very much as he has served himself in the course of his labours, in compiling these Memoirs. He, occupied with his great subject, has kept himself out of view; and we, warmed at the same fire, have been almost as forgetful as he himself. But he will have his revenge of us. All the world has read, or will presently be reading, what he has written; and thousands of readers will be grateful to him for what he has done, so well, for their edification and pleasure; or even if they forget to render this deserved tribute, it will be because with them as with us, a Memoir of Chalmers, if worthily compiled, must, in the nature of the case, quite fill the reader's thoughts and heart, criticism forgotten."—ISAAC TAYLOR, in the North British Review.

"We lose no time in recommending our readers to procure this book, which abounds with choice extracts from the earlier correspondence of the true-hearted Dr. Chalmers; throwing much light on the progress and development of an intellect destined to exercise an influence so important on the Church of his own day, and to transmit to posterity a legacy so precious."—Eclectic Review.

It were easy to adduce many more testimonies to the value of the labours of Dr. Chalmers as a Christian teacher and a zealous and enlightened philanthropist:—but this article is already long, and three or four more quotations must conclude it:

"To activity and enterprise he has read a new lesson. To disinterested but far-seeing goodness he has supplied a new motive. To philanthropy he has given new impulse, and to the pulpit new inspiration. And whilst he has added another to the short catalogue of this world's great men, he has gone up, another and a majestic on-looker, to the cloud of witnesses."—North British Review.

"We meet Dr. Chalmers as we should the war-horse in Job, with feelings which almost unfit us for marking his port, or measuring his paces: 'his neck is clothed with thunder; the glory of his nostrils is terrible; he paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength.' Such a champion in the arena of spiritual warfare ought to be hailed with acclamations, and heralded by every loyal trumpet on the walls of Zion."—Congregational Magazine.

"Known and prized throughout Europe and America, the works of Dr. Chalmers have taken that elevated place in our permanent national literature which must always command for them the study and admiration of every person."

"As specimens of sacred eloquence, sound philosophy, and as impressive exhibitions of evangelical truth and duty, his works will doubtless be read as long as the English language is understood."—DR. K. WILLIAMS.

Chambers, Chambre, or Chalmers, David, a Scottish historian, judge, and lawyer, 1530-1592, was a native of Ross, and educated in the University of Aberdeen, and at Bologna. He travelled on the Continent for some time, and returning home in 1556, took holy orders, and was presented to the parish of Suddie, of which he was made Chancellor. He was an adherent of Queen Mary, who in 1564 created him a Lord of Session by the title of Lord Ormond. He left home when no longer able to serve the failing cause of his queen, and died at Paris. He assisted in the compilation of the Scottish Act of Parliament (Black Acts, 1566,) and was employed in digesting the Laws of Scotland. Histoire Abrégée de tous les Roys de France, Angleterre, et Ecosse, &c., Paris, 1579, 8vo.

Chambers, Ephraim, d. 1740, author of the well-known scientific Dictionary which bears his name, was a native of Kendal, Westmoreland. He was placed with Mr. Senex, a globe-maker, as apprentice, and was encouraged by his master in his taste for scientific investigation. After quitting Mr. Senex, he took chambers at Gray's Inn, (his principal residence for the rest of his life,) and assiduously devoted himself to the preparation of his Dictionary, the first edition of which appeared in 1728, 2 vols. fol., pub. by a subscription of four guineas, with a large list of subscribers. The value of Mr. Chambers's labours was handsomely acknowledged, Nov. 6, 1729, by his being elected F.R.S. A second edition, with corrections and additions, was pub. in 1738. Mr. C. had projected a new work, rather than a new edition, and more than twenty sheets on this plan were printed, with the design of publishing a volume yearly until the completion of the whole. But this plan was abandoned in consequence of an Act then agitated in Parliament, which contained a clause obliging the publishers of all improved editions of books to print their improvements separately. This Bill passed the Commons, but was negatived in the House of Lords. In 1739 a third edition was called for, a fourth in 1741, and a fifth in 1746. After the edition of 1746 the work was greatly enlarged; first by Mr. Scott and Dr. Hill, afterwards by Dr. Rees, Lon., 1781-86, 4 vols. fol., £11, or 418 numbers at 6d. each. In this edition the Supplement, which was pub. Lon., 1755, 2 vols. fol., and modern improvements, were incorporated in one alphabet. Dr. Rees's New Cyclopaedia, 1803-19, 85 parts, 45 vols. 4to, is an invaluable treasury of scientific knowledge.

Mr. Chambers was also concerned in the Literary Magazine, begun in 1735, and in a trans. and abridgment of The Philosophical History and Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, &c., 1742, 5 vols. 8vo. The following remarks in connexion with Mr. Chambers's great work are not without interest:

"While the second edition of Chambers's Cyclopaedia, the pride of Booksellers, and the honour of the English Nation, was in the press, I went to the author, and begged leave to add a single syllable to his magnificent work: and that for Cyclopaedia, he would write Encyclopaedia. To talk to the writer of a Dictionary, is like talking to the writer of a Magazine: every thing adds to his parcel, [we quote this feelingly!] and, instead of contributing one syllable, I was the occasion of a considerable paragraph. I told him that the addition of the preposition en made the meaning of the word more precise: that Cyclopaedia might denote the instruction of a circle, as Cyropaedia is the instruction of Cyrus, the ou in composition, being twined in o; but that, if he wrote Encyclopaedia, it determined it to be from the dative of Cyclos, instruction in a circle. I urged, secondly, that Vossius had observed in his book de Fidei Sermonibus, that "Cyclopædia was used by some authors, but Encyclopædia by the best." This deserved some regard, and he paid it to the best he could: he made an article of his title to justify it."—W. Bowyer: Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, v. 600.

Bowyer at one time entertained the idea so happily carried out subsequently by Dr. Rees—of an enlargement and improvement of the Cyclopædia—we beg his pardon—Encyclopædia. Mr. Clarke thus refers to it:

"Your project of improving and correcting Chambers is a very good one; but, alas! who can execute it? You should have as many undertakers as professions; nay, perhaps, as many Antiquaries as there are different branches of ancient learning."—Nichols's Lit. Anec.: ubi supra.

Chambers, William and Robert, born at Peebles, Scotland, the first about 1800, the second about 1802, are not only distinguished as eminent public benefactors by their wide-spread distribution of valuable knowledge, but also occupy a highly respectable position in the ranks of authors. Mr. Robert Chambers's first work, The Traditions of Edinburgh, was pub. in 1824, and met with immediate and deserved success. In 1826 he pub. The Popular Rhymes of Scotland; in the following year his Picture of Scotland; and shortly afterwards three volumes of histories of the Scottish Rebellions, two of a Life of James I., and three volumes of Scottish Ballads and Songs. His Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen, in 4 volumes, was commenced in 1832 and concluded in 1835. This work elicited warm commendation, and added to the reputation of the intelligent author. (Revised ed., 1855, 5 vols. 8vo. The 5th vol. is by the Rev. Thomas Thomson.)

"There is not a page in the volume that can be pronounced unworthy of the undertaking; which will form a STANDARD WORK in the LITERATURE OF SCOTLAND, and a book of reference in every library throughout the British dominions."—New Monthly Mag.

"It is a standard work, and honourable to every library in which it may find a place."—Metropolitan Mag.

"The biographical sketches are executed in the author's happiest manner,—characterized by that unflinching tone of kindness and good-humour which is the finest trait both in his character and writings. . . . His materials are, we know, abundant; consisting not only of collections which he had for years been silently making, but also of those which his publishers, unaware of his intentions, had accumulated for a similar work."—Edinburgh Literary Journal.

In 1830 Mr. William Chambers gave to the world The Book of Scotland, a general description of the customs, laws, and institutions of that part of the United Kingdom. In 1833 the brothers published a work, the result of their joint labours—A Gazetteer of Scotland. In 1832 William projected the Edinburgh (Weekly) Journal, which immediately obtained a circulation of 50,000, and by 1844, when the folio was exchanged for the octavo form, 90,000 copies were required to supply the demand. Complete sets of this valuable periodical sometimes occur for sale, and should be procured for the library as a valuable repository of instructive and entertaining literature. The success of this Journal induced the brothers to enter into partnership. The results of this union are seen in The People's edition of Standard English Authors, the Educational Course, Chambers's Miscellany, Tracts, Papers for the People, &c. (See Men of the Time, Lon., 1853, to which we are indebted for many of the above facts.) The Select Writings of Robert Chambers have been pub. in 7 vols., the first four of which contain his Essays. In 1844 Mr. Robert Chambers pub. a work which claims a far higher rank than any preceding compilation of the same character. This was A Cyclopædia of English Literature; A Critical and Biographical History of English Writers in all departments of Literature, illustrated by Specimens of their Writings, 2 vols. r. imp. 8vo. It is difficult to speak too highly of the merits of this comprehensive and judicious work. No less than 832 authors are noticed, and the specimens presented of some of the choicest treasures of English lore enable the reader to improve his literary taste while he augments his biographical knowledge. Researches of a similar character may perhaps entitle us to give an opinion in the premises, and we add our testimony to the value of this excellent work, and commend it to the attention of every one who desires an introduction to the English classics. It is well worth four times the trifle which will place it in the reader's possession. In a few years after its appearance, 130,000 copies were sold in England; and there has been a large sale of the American reprint. New ed., with additions, 1858.

"From what I know of the literary reputation and writings of Mr. Robert Chambers, I should be disappointed if he were not qualified for the task. . . . The work will put the reader in the proper point of view for surveying the whole ground over which he is travelling."—WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT.

Also Amer. ed. Nearly 200,000 copies of this work have been sold in Europe and America. Life and Works of Burns. Domestic Annals of Scotland, 1858, 2 vols. demy 8vo. We beg to add upon our own account, that no father of a family, or director of a Library Company, should be satisfied until the whole of the Messrs. Chambers's publications are procured. We commend to the attention of the reader an excellent article in the Dublin University Magazine, entitled WILLIAM AND ROBERT CHAMBERS, in which the interesting history of the brothers is sketched with a graphic pencil. They are well described as

"Both of them men of remarkable native power, both of them trained to habits of business and punctuality, both of them upheld in all their dealings by strict prudence and conscientiousness, and both of them practised, according to their different aims and tendencies, in literary labour."

It was a noble resolve announced by William Chambers in the opening address of the Edinburgh Journal:

"I see the straight path of moral responsibility before me, and shall, by the blessing of God, adhere to the line of rectitude and duty."

"Much of Robert Chambers's leisure time has been devoted to scientific pursuits, and especially to geology,—the result of which has been given to the public in a handsomely-illustrated volume, entitled Ancient Sea-Margins as Illustrative of Changes of the Relative Level of Sea and Land."

Chambers, Sir William, 1726-1796, an eminent architect, of Scottish parentage—of the family of CHALMERS, of Scotland, Barons of Tartan in France—was born at Stockholm, but sent to England when two years of age. He pub. two volumes of Designs, &c., 1757, '63, fol.; a Dissertation on Oriental Gardening, 1774, 4to; and a Treatise on Civil Architecture, 1759, fol.; 4th edit., edited by Joseph Gwilt, 1825, 2 vols. imp. 8vo. Mr. Papworth also has edited this work.

They returned to England in 1766. The results of their investigations were given to the world by the Society in 1769, fol.; vol. ii., edited by the Society, 1797, fol., 100 plates and vignettes. In 1774, fol., was pub. Inscriptiones Antiquæ, &c., which should accompany Gruter's work. Travels in Asia Minor, 1775, 4to; and in Greece, 1776, 4to, and in 1817, 2 vols. 4to; and (with a Life of Dr. C.) by Rev. Chandler, Samuel, D.D., 1693–1756, an eminent Dissenting minister, a native of Berkshire, was educated at an academy at Tewkesbury, and completed his studies at Leyden. In 1716 he took charge of a Presbyterian congregation at Peckham. Having lost his fortune, he opened a book-store in London, still discharging his ministerial duties. He was highly esteemed through life for his learning and piety. Of his many publications, 1722–77, we notice the following: A Vindication of the Christian Religion; in two parts, Lon., 1728, 8vo. The first part contains a Discourse on Miracles, the 2d an answer to Tindal's Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion. Plain Reasons for being a Christian, 1730, 8vo. A Paraphrase and Crit. Comment on Joel, 1735, 4to.
 "The criticism is not of a high order, and many important difficulties in Joel remain untouched."—ORME.
 "Critical and illustrative."—BICKERSTETH.

Dr. C. projected a commentary upon each of the prophetic books. A Vindication of the Hist. of the Old Testament, 1741, 8vo. This was an answer to Morgan's Moral Philosopher. A Critical History of the Life of David, 1766, 2 vols. 8vo. (The Review of the History of the Man after God's own Heart was pub. in 1762.)

"This very learned and valuable work contains a successful vindication of many parts of David's conduct to which exceptions have been taken by skeptics and unbelievers. It throws great light also upon many of the Psalms, not a few of which are here presented to the reader in a new and improved translation."—Dr. E. Williams.

"Chandler's Life of David is more critical and sober in judgment than Delany's; but the latter has finer thoughts and more taste. Chandler too much palliates David's crimes."—BICKNAP.

"It is the most valuable of all Chandler's productions, abounding with solid learning, accurate research, and many important and original views. . . . It is very far superior to the work of Delany on the same subject."—ORRIS: q. v. for the cause of its publication.

"A book above all praise. It was occasioned by the publication, in 1762, of a vile and blasphemous tract entitled The History of the Man after God's own Heart. Dr. Chandler has illustrated many of the Psalms in an admirable manner."—HORNE.

Sermons, from his MSS.; with Life, &c. by Amory, 1768, 4 vols. 8vo.

"A vein of goodness and rational piety pervades the whole."—Lon. Critical Review.

"His practical discourses are excellent: there is such a fullness of thought upon every subject which Dr. Chandler treats as is rarely met with and shows a mind richly furnished."—Lon. Month. Rev.

Mr. White pub. in 1777, 4to, from Dr. C.'s MSS., his Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles to the Galatians and Ephesians, with a Crit. and Prac. Comment. on the Epistles to the Thessalonians.

"The author adheres most closely and constantly to the spirit of the original." &c.—WATTS.

"Dr. Chandler's sentiments were too incorrect on some important subjects to leave him capable of doing full justice to Paul's Epistles. He was an Arian,—the effects of which appear in the unnatural coldness of his style on some of those topics which warmed and elevated the souls of holy men of old, as well as in his perverted interpretations of various passages."—ORRIS.

See Horne's Introd.; and Lon. Monthly Rev., O.S., lvi. 161.

"He was not a man of strictly evangelical views; but he possessed great learning, very strong sense, inflexible resolution, and was a zealous advocate of divine revelation. His four volumes of Sermons are well worth reading."—Dr. E. Williams.

Ellery Channing, and Walter Channing, M.D., (q. v.), Prof. of Rhetoric and Oratory in Harvard College from 1819 to '51,—“where the exactness of his instruction, his cultivated taste, and his highly-disciplined mental powers gave him an eminent reputation with his pupils.” He edited vols. vii., viii., and ix. of the N. American Review, and contributed many articles to subsequent volumes of that journal. He is the author of the Life of his grandfather, William Ellery, in Sparks's Amer. Ellery, who was a member of Congress 1776-86 and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. His grandfather and father held offices under commissions from Gen. Washington. He is a brother of Wm. Ellery Channing. Educated at Harvard Coll., and grad. M.D. at the Univ. of Penna., having studied in the office of Prof. Barton, of Phila. Prof. of Midwifery and Medical Jurisprudence at the Univ. of Cambridge. 1. Address on the Prevention of Pauperism, 1843, 12mo. 2. A Physician's Vacation; or, A Summer in Europe, 1856, 8vo, pp. 564. Dr. C. is the author of many valuable tracts, essays, and discourses on medical subjects.

Channing, William Ellery, D.D., 1780-1842, b. at Newport, brother of the preceding, was entered of Harvard College when fourteen years of age, and graduated with distinction in 1798. After leaving college he resided for some time as a private tutor in a family in Virginia. Selecting the ministry as his profession, he was ordained in June, 1803, and assumed the charge of a church in Federal Street, Boston. At the ordination of the Rev. Jared Sparks in Baltimore, 1819, he preached a sermon on the Unitarian belief, which elicited responses from a number of the advocates of the Trinity. In 1823 he pub. an Essay on National Literature, and in 1826 (in the Christian Examiner) Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton. He had now gained an extensive reputation as a literary man, which was confirmed and strengthened by his subsequent productions,—of which may be mentioned his Remarks on the Character and Writings of Fenelon, (Christian Examiner, 1829;) Address on Self-Culture, 1838; a work in opposition to Negro Slavery, 1835; and Discourses on the Evidences of Revealed Religion. His last public address was delivered at Lenox, Massachusetts, August 1, 1842, (two months before his decease,) in commemoration of Emancipation in the British West Indies. See Griswold's Prose Writers of America.

The first collected Amer. ed. of his works was pub. in Boston in 1841, 5 vols. 12mo; 6th ed., 1846, 6 vols. 12mo; Lon., 1845, 6 vols. 8vo, (edited by Joseph Barker;) last Lon. ed., 1855, cr. 8vo. The Essay on Milton was reviewed with much severity by Lord Macaulay, (Edin. Rev., lxi. 214;) but Dr. Channing's literary abilities have been estimated highly by many critics on both sides of the Atlantic.

"He looks through the external forms of things in search of the secret and mysterious principles of thought, action, and being. He takes little notice of the varieties of manner and character that form the favourite topics of the novelist and poet. Mind in the abstract, its nature, properties, and destiny, are his constant theme. He looks at material objects chiefly as the visible expressions of the existence, character, and will of the sublime Unseen Intelligence whose power created and whose presence informs and sustains the universe."—A. H. EVERETT: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1835, 366.

Read Mr. Everett's comparison (supra) between Channing and Washington Irving. See also Wm. H. Prescott's Miscellanies, 1855, 270.

"From the appearance of his Discourse on the Evidences of Christianity—a luminous exposition—till the lamented death of this eminent man, the public expectation which had been raised so high by the character of his earliest performances was continually excited and fulfilled by the appearance of some new and earnest expression of his thoughts on themes which come immediately home to men's business and bosoms,—religion, government, and literature in their widest sense and application."—Retrospect of the Religious Life of England, (by John James Taylor, B.A.)

"Channing is unquestionably the first writer of the age. From his writings may be extracted some of the richest poetry and richest conceptions, clothed in language, unfortunately for our literature, too little studied in the day in which we live."—Fraser's Magazine.

"The thoughts that breathe and the words that burn abound in his writings more than in those of any modern author with whom we are acquainted. He seems to move and live in a pure and elevated atmosphere of his own, from which he surveys the various interests of society and pronounces on them a just and discriminating judgment."—India Gazette.

Chapman, George, 1557–1634, supposed to have been a native of Kent, was entered when 17 of Trinity College, Oxford, where he was distinguished for his knowledge of the Greek and Latin authors. On leaving college he cultivated a friendship with Shakspeare, Spenser, Daniel, and other eminent poets of the day. His first publication was Ovid's Banquet of Sausages, 1595, 4to, to which was added The Amorous Contention of Phillis and Flora. After this he pub. many poetical and dramatic pieces of greater or less merit, for a detailed account of which we must refer the reader to Lowndes's Bibl. Man.; War-ton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry; Wood's Athen. Oxon.; Langbaine's Dramatic Poets; and the Retrospective Review, vols. iv. and v., 1821–22. He is now best known by his translation of Homer,—the first into English. He pub. in 1596, 4to, The Shield of Achilles; and in the same year seven books of the Iliad appeared. The entire translation, with comments, followed, printed by N. Butter, in a folio without date, supposed to be about 1600. This translation has elicited warm commendation and censure equally decided. Waller, Dr. Johnson, Godwin, Hallam, Lamb, and Coleridge are among his admirers. Pope, whilst admitting his defects, considers that he covers them by

"A daring, fiery spirit, that animates his translation, which is something like what one might imagine Homer himself to have written before he arrived at years of discretion."

The scholars of Chapman's day were greatly delighted with what they looked upon as a credit to the brotherhood:

"At which time Chapman was highly celebrated among scholars for his brave language in that translation, I mean of those Iliads that are translated into tester ad oca syllabus, or lines of fourteen syllables."—Athen. Oxon.

"He has by no means represented the dignity or the simplicity of Homer. He is sometimes paraphrastic and redundant, but more frequently retrenches or impoverishes what he could not feel and express. In the mean time, he labours with the inconvenience of an awkward, inharmonious, and unheroic measure, imposed by custom, but disgusting to modern ears. Yet he is not always without strength or spirit. He has enriched our language with many compound epithets, so much in the manner of Homer, such as the silver-footed Thetis, the silver-throned Juno, the triple-feathered helms, the high-walled Thebes, the fair-haired boy, the silver-flowing floods, the hugely-peopled towns, the Grecians navy-bound, the strong-winged lance, and many more which might be collected."—War-ton's Hist. of English Poetry.

The Rev. R. Hooper has pub. new eds., with Notes, &c., of translations by Chapman, viz.:—Homer's Iliads, with Life of Chapman, 1857, 2 vols.; Homer's Odysseys, 1857, 2 vols.; Homer's Batrachomyomachia, Hymns, and Epigrams, Hesiod's Works and Days, Musæus's Hero and Leander, and Juvenal's Fifth Satire, 1858, 1 vol.

Eastward-Ho—the joint production of Chapman, Ben Jonson, Marston, and Martin—was pub. in 1605, 4to. We notice it especially in order to give an amusing specimen of Langbaine's deference to "rare Ben:"

"I can give him no greater commendation than that he was so intimate with the famous John [sic] as to engage in a Triumvirate with him and Marston in a Play called Eastward-Ho,—a Favour which the haughty Ben could seldom be persuaded to."—Dramatic Poets.

The reflection upon the Scots got the authors into trouble. In 1611 appeared his May-Day, a witty Comedy, in which "a man of the highest literary taste for the pieces in vogue is characterized" as "one that has read Marcus Aurelius, Gesta Romanorum, the Mirrour of Magistrates, &c." Among Chapman's other works were Bussey d'Ambols, The Widow's Tears, a version of the Odyssey, of the Batrachomyomachia, and the Hymns and Epigrams, a trans. of Musæus, 1616, and the Georgicks of Hesiod, 1619. War-ton remarks that his eighteen plays,

"Although now forgotten, must have contributed in no inconsiderable degree to enrich and advance the English stage."—Hist. of English Poetry.

"Webster, his fellow-dramatist, praises his full and heightened style,—a character which he does not deserve in any favourable sense; for his diction is chiefly marked by barbarous ruggedness, false elevation, and extravagant metaphor. The drama owes him very little: his Bussey d'Ambols is a piece of frigid atrocity; and in 'The Widow's Tears,' where his heroine Cynthia falls in love with a sentinel guarding the corpse of her husband, whom she was bitterly lamenting, he has dramatized one of the most puerile and disgusting legends ever fabricated for the disparagement of female constancy."—CAMPBELL: Lives of the Poets.

Chapone, Hester, 1727–1801, was a daughter of Thomas Mulso, Esq., of Twywell in Northamptonshire. Her literary taste was developed at an early age; as it is asserted that when only nine years old she composed a romance entitled The Loves of Amorot and Melissa. At the house of Samuel Richardson, the novelist, she met with Mr. Chapone, a lawyer, to whom she was married in 1760, after a long engagement. Mr. C. lived but ten months after his marriage. She was the intimate friend of Elizabeth Carter for more than fifty years, and had the courage to argue with the redoubtable Dr. Johnson. In 1758 she contributed to the Advertiser the story of Fidelity. See Nos. 77, 78, 79. When Elizabeth Carter's trans. of Epictetus was pub. in 1758, Mrs. Chapone prefixed an ode to the work. Her letters on the Improvement of the Mind, addressed to her niece, were pub. in 1773, 2 vols. 12mo, (and 1801, 8vo); and two years later appeared the Miscellanies in Prose and Verse; many of these were the compositions of her earlier days. Her Letter to a new-married Lady was pub. in 1777, 12mo. Miss Mulso—for she was then unmarried—contributed four billets in the 10th No. of the Marbler.

Johnson complains to Mrs. Thrale:

"You make verses, and they are read in public, and I know nothing about them. This very crime, I think, broke the link of amity between Richardson and Miss M. [also] after a tenderness and confidence of many years."—April 15, 1780.

We have already referred to Dr. Johnson's letter to Mrs. Chapone, giving his opinion of the Earl of Carlisle's Father's Revenge, (q. v.)

Her Posthumous Works, including Correspondence and some pieces not before printed, were pub. in 1807, 2 vols. 12mo; 2d edit., 1808. Her poetry has been much admired, and the Letters on the Improvement of the Mind have proved extensively useful.

"Although more than sixty years have elapsed since this work was first published, its advice does not even yet appear antiquated: and is as well calculated to improve the rising generation as it was to instruct the youth of their grandmothers."—Mrs. Brown.

"Tis certain The Whole Duty of Man was written by one who suffered by the troubles in Ireland; and some lines in this piece give great grounds to conjecture that Bishop Chappel was the author."—BEAUFORT'S BELL. See Peck's Desiderata.

Chardin, Sir John, 1643–1713, a celebrated traveller, a native of Paris, lived many years in England, where he died. He was knighted by Charles II. The last edit. of his travels was pub. by M. L. Langles, Paris, 1811, 10 vols. 8vo, with an imp. fol. atlas. His travels through Persia will be found in vol. II. of Harris's Collection, and extracts from them in vol. IX. of Pinkerton's Collection. In Harmer's Observations on divers passages of Scripture, &c., 1764, and 1776, are incorporated many of Sir John's MS. notes. The lover of Travels should secure when possible that delightful folio—The Travels of Sir John Chardin into Persia and the East Indies, &c., Lon., 1686—which is, says an eminent authority,

"The best account of Mahomedan nations ever published."—SIR WILLIAM JONES.

"The faculty of seeing, by a rapid and comprehensive glance, the character of a country and people, was possessed in the highest degree by Chardin, and secures him an undisputed supremacy in that department of literature."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH.

Her unhappy temper led to a separation from Fleetwood, the manager of Drury Lane Theatre, and she ridiculed him in a dramatic piece entitled the Art of Management, or Tragedy expelled, Lon., 1735, 8vo. It is said that Fleetwood purchased and destroyed nearly the whole of this impression. The Lover's Treat; or Unnatural Hatred, Lon., 8vo. The Hist. of Henry Dumont, &c. Charlodon, John, D.D. See CHARDON.
Charlomet, James Caulfield, Earl of, 1728-1799, a distinguished Irish nobleman, left an unpublished history of Italian poetry from Dante to Metastasio. Some of his letters, with others addressed to Henry Flood, were pub. in 1820, 4to.

Charles I., King of England, b. Nov. 9, 1600, murdered Jan. 30, 1649. Two years after the death of the king appeared Reliquiæ Sacræ Carolinæ; or, The Works of that Great Monarch and Glorious Martyr, King Charles the First, both Civil and Sacred, printed by Sam. Brown, at the Hague, 1651, 8vo. The Books, Speeches, Letters, &c. of Charles I. were pub. Lon., 1661, 12mo; and the Works of King Charles the Martyr, with a Collection of Declarations, Treatises, and other Papers, &c., appeared in 1664, 2 vols. fol.—Bibliotheca Regia, bearing date 1689, 8vo.

Horace Walpole considers that the greater part of the above papers were the composition of his majesty, but Isaac Reed, an abler critic, divides the Letters, Declarations, and Messages between Lord Clarendon, Lord Falkland, and Sir John Colpepper. Indeed, it is impossible to decide, of the numerous collections and separate papers pub. in this volume, what the king did or did not write. A copious list of these publications will be found in Watt's Bib. Brit. The literary ability of the king is beyond question. See GAUDEN, JOHN. He did not confine himself to prose. The elegy written at Carisbrook Castle is not devoid of merit, and an English version (Lon. 1655, 8vo) of Bishop Sanderson's Lectures de Juramenti promissorii Obligatione affords us a specimen of his majesty's skill as a translator. Whether meritorious or otherwise, the king was not afraid to submit it to the criticism of Bishop Juxon, Dr. Hammond, and Mr. Thomas Herbert.

But the most interesting literary question connected with Charles I. is the authorship of ΕΙΚΩΝ ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΗ.
 The Pourtraiture of his sacred Majesty in his solitudes and sufferings.

This work, dated 1648, was pub. by Dr. Gauden immediately after the execution of the monarch:
 "Had it appeared a week sooner, it might have preserved the king."—MALCOLM LANE.

But Mr. Laing little knew what manner of spirit the regicides were of, when he supposed that a book—or an Alexandrian library of books—would have been suffered to stand between them and their victim! The unlearned reader must be informed that from that day to this it has been a matter of vehement controversy—in which many great and good men have warred high in strife—whether Charles I. or Dr. Gauden wrote this most interesting book. So great indeed was the interest which it excited, that 47 editions—48,000 copies—were speedily absorbed at home and abroad. We have already alluded to the vexed question of the authorship of this volume under Annesley, Arthur, Earl of Anglesey, and there referred the reader to our notice of Bishop Gauden,—which reference we repeat.

Charles II., King of England, 1630-1685.—
 "the only genius of the line of Stuart,—was no author, unless we allow him to have composed the two simple papers found in his strong box after his death. But they are universally supposed to have been given to him as a commendatory excuse for his embracing doctrines which he was too idle to examine, too thoughtless to remember, and too sensible to have believed on reflection."—Walpole's R. & N. Authors.

Charles II. may still claim a place in the roll of authors on the strength of the song,

"I pass all my days in a shady old grove,"

Sir John Hawkins credits it to him, and Lord Orford does not decide against it. See Appendix to Hawkins's History of Music, v. 477; Park Walpole's R. & N. Authors; a list of State Papers, Letters, and Speeches, pub. under the name of Charles II., in Watt's Bib. Brit.

Charleton, or Charlton, Walter, M.D., 1619-1707, was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he was noted for his attainments in logic and philosophy. He was physician to Charles I., and to Charles II. during his exile and after his Restoration. In 1689 he was chosen President of the College of Physicians. He wrote and compiled many learned professional and other works, 1650-88, an account of which will be found in Athen. Oxon. Among the best known of these are the following: The Darkness of Atheism dispelled by the Light of Nature; a Phisico-Theological Treatise, Lon., 1655, 4to. Epicurus his Morals, collected out of Various Authors; with an Apology for Epicurus, 1655, '56, '70, 4to. Chorea Gigantum; or, The Most Famous Antiquity of Great Britain,—Stone-Henge,—standing on Salisbury Plain, referred to the Danes, 1663, 4to.

Sir William Dugdale and many other eminent antiquaries agreed with our author in depriving the Romans of the credit of Stone-Henge. Inigo Jones led the other side. See Biog. Brit., and Athen. Oxon.

He subsequently preached for some time in Ireland. Upon the Restoration he returned to London, but was unwilling to conform, and preached in private assemblies of the Nonconformists. He pub. only one sermon, (in the Morning Exercises), but after his decease two vols. were pub. by Adams and Veel from his MSS., Lon., 1682, '83, fol. Works, Lon., 1815, 9 vols. 8vo.

"Gaining [by his preaching] infinite love and applause from the brethren, who held him to be a person of excellent parts, strong reason, great judgment, and (which do not often go together) cur-

"The sublimeness, variety, and rareness of the truths handled, together with the excellence of the composure, neatness of the style, and whatever is wont to make any book desirable, all concur in the recommendation of it. "His thoughts are often in disorder; he has no clear and distinct idea in many of the differences he makes."—Dr. DODDRIDGE.

"None of the writings of Charnock are properly exegetical, and yet they contain a considerable portion of scriptural interpretation, mixed with the most important doctrinal and practical views. His style is generally chaste and easy; remarkably free of that verbosity and clumsiness which so generally belonged to the writers of his class and period. I think Doddridge scarcely does justice to Charnock—by representing his style as incorrect, and his thoughts obscure and badly arranged. Mr. Toplady, on the contrary, eulogizes his work on the Attributes in the strongest manner."—OWEN.

"Perspicuity and depth: metaphysical sublimity and evangelical simplicity: immense learning, but irrefragable reasoning, conspire to render this performance one of the most inestimable productions that ever did honour to the sanctified judgment and genius of a human being."—TOPLADY.

"In Charnock you will find substantial divinity, and of the right sort."—Mother's Student.

"Charnock was a deep divine, rather than an eloquent writer. He reasons well; but the connecting links of his chain are too much neglected. His sentences have the cast of independent propositions. Too much uniformity of style prevails, and very seldom any real pathos occurs: his sentences are also defective in the collocation of the words; and often the terms are not well chosen."—Dr. E. WILLIAMS.

"I have not seen any author who has exceeded, probably no one who has equalled, Charnock on the Existence and Attributes of God."—GRIFFITH WILLIAMS.

"The best practical treatise the world ever saw in English upon this subject."

"Charnock's works are full of force and originality."

"Mr. Charnock with his masculine style and inexhaustible vein of thought."—HEATON.

"A deep searching, often sublime, and powerful writer."—BICKERSTETH.

Calamy and Ryland also highly commend our author.

After giving so many critics (14) an opportunity of being heard, we may perhaps be pardoned for giving our own opinions: we have twice carefully studied every word of the Discourses on the Attributes, and we consider the work one of the greatest of unimpaired compositions. We advise the reader, if he have it not, to procure it immediately, and read it through once a twelvemonth for the rest of his life.

Chatham, Rt. Hon. William Pitt, Earl of, 1768-1778, was the second son of Robert Pitt of Boconnoc, in Cornwall. After studying at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford, he obtained a cornetcy in the Blues. In 1736 he was returned to Parliament as a member for Old Sarum. Here his distinguished abilities and powers of oratory soon attracted the eyes of the nation, and gained him that commanding position which he occupied for so many years to the glory of England and the confusion of her enemies. The name of this great man belongs to political, rather than to literary, history, but we must be allowed to linger for a few moments upon so suggestive a theme. We have already given some interesting particulars connected with Chatham as an orator: see BAILEY, NATHAN; BARROW, ISAAC. The History of his Life, Lon., 1783, 8vo. History of the Earl of Chatham, by the Rev. Francis Thackeray, A.M., Lon., 1807, 2 vols. 4to.

"Biographers, translators, editors—all, in short, who employ themselves in illustrating the lives or the writings of others, are peculiarly exposed to the Laes Brevitatis, or disease of admiration. But we scarcely remember to have seen a patient so far gone in this distemper as Mr. Thackeray."—T. B. MACAULAY: Edinburgh Review, 1834.

We must be careful to avoid the "LUES BOSWELLIANA!" But in our case "there is safety in numbers."

The reader must peruse Thackeray's quartos, and not neglect the following valuable work:

Chatham Papers: Correspondence; from the original MSS., Lon., 1839-40, 4 vols. 8vo.

"There is hardly any man in modern times, with the exception, perhaps, of Lord Somers, who fills so large a space in our history, and of whom we know so little, as Lord Chatham; and yet he is the person to whom every one would at once point, if desired to name the greatest statesman and orator that this country ever produced. We regard this work, then, as one of the greatest value: and hold the editors (of whom his great-grandson and personal representative is one) to have rendered a great service to the memory of their illustrious ancestor, and to the public interests, by determining to keep back no part of the precious documents intrusted to their care."—Edin. Review.

"Never did history offer more instructive lessons for present guidance than are contained in this Correspondence."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"Lord Chatham was the most powerful orator that ever illustrated and ruled the senate of this empire. For nearly half a century he was not merely the arbiter of the destinies of his own country, but 'the foremost man in all the world.'"—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"Sir, the venerable age of this great man, his merited rank, his superior eloquence, his splendid qualities, his eminent services, the vast space he fills in the eyes of mankind, and, more than all the rest, his fall from power, which, like death, canonizes and sanctifies a great character, will not suffer me to censure any part of his conduct. I am afraid to flatter him; I am sure I am not disposed to blame him. Let those who have betrayed him by their adulation insult him with their malevolence."—EDMUND BURKE: Speech on American Taxation, April 19, 1774.

"Upon the whole, there was in this man something that could create, subvert, or reform; an understanding, a spirit, and an eloquence to summon mankind to society, or to break the bonds of slavery asunder, and to rule the wilderness of free minds with unbounded authority; something that could establish or overwhelm empire, and strike a blow in the world that should resound through its history."—GRATYAN.

Chatterton, Thomas, 1752-1780, a native of Bristol, was the posthumous son of a schoolmaster. His ancestors had long held the office of sexton of St. Mary Redcliffe, and it was in the muniment room of this church that he found the materials which he converted to the purposes of imposture. He was so much indisposed to application, that efforts to teach him the alphabet were abandoned as hopeless, and he was sent home to his mother. When eight years of age the illuminated capitals of an old French Musical MS. attracted his attention, and his mother taught him to read from a Black-Letter Testament or Bible. So early did he display a fondness for antiquity! He was then admitted to Colston's charity school, where he remained until he had passed his 14th year. He was now apprenticed to a scrivener of Bristol, where he had but little employment, and most of his time was devoted to the perusal of works on antiquities, heraldry, and poetry, not neglecting history and divinity. Before his 12th year he had produced some poetry, which evinced considerable talent. In 1766, when the New Bridge at Bristol was opened, a paper appeared in Farley's Bristol Journal, entitled "A Description of the Fryers first passing over the Old Bridge, taken from an Ancient Manuscript." This excited much attention, and was traced to Chatterton, who declared that this paper and many other MSS. had been found by his father in an old iron chest in the muniment room of the Church of St. Mary Redcliffe. He now distributed MSS. according to the tastes of those to whom he sent them. A citizen addicted to Heraldry was presented with a pedigree which carried his name up to the Conquest; a religious gentleman was favoured with a fragment of a sermon, and Mr. Burgum, an advocate of the authenticity of the MSS., was rewarded by a poem entitled The Roman of the Cynghthe, written by John de Bergham, an ancestor, about four hundred and fifty years before! The principal part of these MSS. Chatterton discovered—he said—to be the poetical compositions of W. Canynge (a distinguished merchant of Bristol in the 15th century) and his friend, Thomas Rowley, a monk or secular priest. Chatterton was emboldened by his success with Barret, a surgeon, then writing a History of Bristol, Catcott, and others, to try his imposture upon Horace Walpole, who had sometime before completed his Anecdotes of Painters. He proposed (by letter) to furnish him with accounts of a series of great painters who had flourished at Bristol, and transmitted specimens of the ancient poetry. Mr. Walpole submitted these to Gray and Mason, who immediately declared them to be forgeries. Walpole advised his correspondent to devote himself to the duties of his profession in future. The poems were returned at Chatterton's request, and he was very indignant at his adviser. Walpole has been greatly, and, as we think, most unjustly, blamed for his conduct in this affair. He drew up a statement of the facts which should satisfy the most captious. In April, 1770, having previously sent some antiquarian contributions to the Town and Country Magazine, Chatterton arrived in London, and sought literary employment. The young author—but seventeen years of age—was greatly encouraged by some engagements with which he was favoured by the booksellers, and sent home cheering letters, accompanied with presents, to his mother and sister. In a short time, however, this happy frame of mind vanished: he became despondent, seems to have lost all hopes of prosperity, and was found dead in his bed, August 25, (four months after his arrival in London,) from the effects—as was supposed—of a dose of arsenic. There has been much controversy wasted respecting the causes which led to this sad event. The oft-repeated complaint that he was suffered to perish from want of the necessaries of life, is altogether erroneous. It is true that he had not eaten any thing for two or three days before his death; but it is also true that he refused with indignation Mrs. Angel's (his landlady) invitation to participate in her dinner, declaring that he was not hungry; and it is also true that Mr. Hamilton supplied him with money a short time before his rash act, and invited him to apply to him when again in need. The solution of the mystery attending his melancholy end is to us very plain: if any man was ever insane, Thomas Chatterton was. If any one doubt this, let him read his Last Will and Testament, penned before he left Bristol. We might say more upon this subject, but our limits forbid excursions. That insanity was in the family—developed in his own sister, indeed—is no secret. At the time of Chatterton's death he was aged 17 years, 9 months, and a few days.

Of these celebrated Poems the principal are The Tragedy of Ella, The Execution of Sir Charles Bawdin, Ode to Ella, The Battle of Hastings, The Tournament, One or Two Dialogues, and A Description of Canynge's Feast. See a notice of these in Warton's History of English Poetry. They were pub. by Thomas Tyrwhitt, in 1777, 8vo, and an animated controversy as to their authenticity sprang up and raged for a long period. See list of publications in Lowndes's Bibl. Manual, and the dissertations of Warton, Campbell, Mathias, Gregory, Southey, &c. A second edit., 8vo, appeared in the same year, (1777); the 3d, in 1778, 8vo; and a splendid 4to in 1782, with a Commentary, in which the Antiquity of them is considered and defended, by Jeremiah Milles, D.D. A more complete edit. was pub. in 1803, 3 vols. 8vo, edited by Southey and Cottle, (with a review by the former of the Rowley Controversy,) and a Life by Gregory. Another edit. of Chatterton's works was pub. by H. G. Bohn, in 1842, 2 vols. p. 8vo, containing a Life, the Controversy, &c. To these volumes the reader should add the Life of Chatterton by John Dix, author of Lays of Home, Local Legends, &c., Lon., 1837, fp. 8vo; new ed. 1851. This volume contains the poet's unpublished Poems and Correspondence.

"Mr. Dix has most consistently come forward as the biographer of Chatterton. Himself a poet, he has successfully endeavoured to renew an interest in the fate of one of England's greatest, though most unfortunate, bards."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"This volume contains all that can be desired to be known respecting Chatterton."—Lon. Eclectic Review.

"Mr. Dix has, in addition to what was before known, gathered up 'all the fragments.' His biography is heart-touching."—LITERARY HENRY.

"The best Life of Chatterton."—The Symposium.

The genius of Chatterton was of the very first order, and under the guidance of sound principles, and a well-regulated mind, would have added greatly to the poetical treasures—so rich and so abundant—of the English tongue.

"This youth was a prodigy of genius; and would have proved the first of English poets had he reached a mature age."—THOMAS WARTON.

"Chatterton's was a genius like that of Homer and Shakespeare, which appears not above once in many centuries."—VICENTINUS KNOX.

"The inequality of Chatterton's various productions may be compared to the disproportion of the ungrown giant. His works had nothing of the definite neatness of that precocious talent which stops short in early maturity. His thirst for knowledge was that of a being taught by instinct to lay up materials for the exercise of great and undeveloped powers. . . . No English poet ever equalled him at the same age. Tasso alone can be compared to him as a juvenile prodigy."—THOMAS CAMPBELL.

"The poems of Chatterton may be divided into two grand classes—those ascribed to Rowley, and those which the bard of Bristol avowed to be his own composition. Of these classes the former is incalculably superior to the latter in poetical powers and diction."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

"Nothing in Chatterton can be separated from Chatterton. His noblest flight, his sweetest strains, his grossest rhapsody, and his most common-place imitations of the productions of magazines, were all the effluences of the same ungovernable impulse, which, chameleon-like, imbibed the colours of all it looked on. It was Ossean, or a Saxon monk, or Gray, or Smollett, or Janes; and if it failed most in what it most affected to be—a poet of the fifteenth century—it was because it could not imitate what had not existed."—HORACE WALPOLE.

Warton well sums up the question of the authenticity of the Rowley poems by demonstrating that

"However extraordinary it was for Chatterton to produce them in the 18th century, it was impossible that Rowley could have written them in the fifteenth."

He also remarks:

"It will be asked, For what end or purpose did he contrive such an imposture? I answer, from lucrative views; or perhaps from the pleasure of deceiving the world, a motive which, in many minds, operates more powerfully than the hopes of gain. He probably promised to himself greater emoluments from this indirect mode of exercising his abilities; or he might have sacrificed even the vanity of appearing in the character of an applauded original author, to the private enjoyment of the success of his invention and dexterity."—History of English Poetry.

"Nothing appears to have felt in executing these numberless and multifarious impositions. His ruling passion was not the vanity of a poet who depends upon the opinion of others for its gratification, but the stolid pride of talent, which felt nourishment in the solitary contemplation of superiority over the dupes who fell into his toils."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

As the Rowley controversy was one of the most interesting and animated in the History of English Literature, we present (from the St. James's Chronicle of the time) a list of the partisans on each side. This will correct the misapprehension that on their first publication the forgeries of Chatterton enlisted many advocates.

Indeed, considering the philological obstruction to credence, it is not a little remarkable that such scholars as Jacob Bryant and Dean Milles could allow themselves to be so grossly deceived, even for an instant. That when once committed, they should perversely adhere to their judgment, and refuse to encourage any doubts suggested by the skeptical, is most natural. To be strictly impartial in judgment, especially where personal reputation is at stake, hardly belongs to man.

Chaucer, Geoffrey, 1328?–1400, "The Father of English Poetry," was a native of London. His parentage and early life are involved in great obscurity, and the honour of his education is claimed by both Universities: therefore as an amicable adjustment of the controversy, an ingenious theory presumes him to have resided alternately at Oxford and Cambridge. Chaucer was a great favourite at the court of Edward III., and a devoted adherent to the celebrated John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, whose sister-in-law, (she became so subsequently,) Philippa de Rouet, accepted the offer of his hand. By this connexion the poet became linked with the good or ill fortune which might attach to greatness. Even this generally received narrative has been doubted by some critics. It will however be easily believed that in this season of courtship he composed The Parliament of Birds. In 1356 we find Chaucer bearing arms in the expedition of Edward III. against France. For some time he was held as a prisoner of war by the enemy. In 1367 he was allowed an annual pension of twenty marks, (say £240), and in 1373 was employed in an embassy to Genoa on affairs of State. A year later than this he was appointed comptroller of the customs of wool, &c. It was during this visit to Italy (he had before travelled on the Continent) that he enjoyed some delightful converse with Petrarch, to which he alludes in the Prologue to the Clerke's Tale:

"I wol you tell a tale, which that I Learned at Padoue of a worthy clerk,
As proved by his wordes and his werk;
Fraunceis Petrark, the laurest poete,
Highte this clerk whos rhetorike swete
Enlumined all Italle of poetrie,
As Lynnan did of philosophie," &c.

Mr. Tyrwhitt is inclined to doubt this meeting of the poets, but De Sade promised to prove its occurrence. He died before he had fulfilled his pledge. Four years before this acquaintance, Chaucer had added to the evidences of his own poetical talents by the lament for the death of Blanche, Duchess of Lancaster, entitled The Booke of the Dutchesse. In the early part of the reign of Richard II. our poet became involved in the political and religious troubles of the day, espousing the cause of John Comberton, (John de Northampton,) a warm champion of the doctrines of Wicliffe. Comberton was imprisoned, while Chaucer escaped the same fate by a precipitate flight to the Continent. Of course he lost his place in the customs. He was so imprudent as to return to London in a short period; was committed to the Tower, and only released by disclosing the names and projects of his late associates. For this breach of confidence, he subsequently experienced great remorse, and composed his Testament of Love, in which he complains of the change of his fortunes, and of the disgrace in which his conduct had involved him.

In 1386 he was elected Knight of the Shire for Kent, and the rise of his fortunes was accelerated by the return of the Duke of Lancaster from Spain in 1389. In this year the poet was made clerk of the works at Westminster, and in the next year at Windsor and other palaces. Other proofs of regard were bestowed by the king, (and also by his successor Henry IV., son of his patron, the Duke of Lancaster,) and with his annual pipe of wine and his handsome pension, the poet felt himself sufficiently at ease to compose those famous Canterbury Tales which will carry his name to the remotest posterity. His experience of the world had taught him the value of retirement, and it does not appear that the prosperity of the great House to which he had ever been a devoted adherent induced him to exchange the quietude of his rural walks and meditations for the splendour and excitements of a brilliant Court. The necessity of arranging some business concerns drew him to London for a few days, where fatigue brought on an illness with which his advanced age was unable to cope.

"He was buried in the Abbey of Westminster before the chapel of St. Bennet; by whose sepulchre is written on a table hanging on a pillar his epitaph made by a poet laureate."—CAXTON, in his editt. of Chaucer's trans. of Boethius.

Chaucer was a voluminous writer. In addition to his minor poems, and his prose compositions, of which the Testament of Love and two of the Canterbury Tales are the principal, he was the author of the following poetical works:

1. THE CANTERBURY TALES, extending to above 17,000 lines, (exclusive of the doubtful portion and the prose.)
2. THE ROMAUNT OF THE ROSE, a translation from the French of William de Lorris; and of a portion of Meun's continuation, of which there are nearly 8,000 lines.
3. TROILUS AND CRESEIDE, 5 Books.
4. THE COURT OF LOVE.
5. THE COMPLAINT OF PITIE.
6. OF QUEEN ARMELIDE AND FALSE AROITE.
7. THE ASSEMBLY OF FOULES.
8. THE COMPLAINT OF THE BLACK NIGHT.
9. CHAUCER'S A. B. C.
10. THE BOOKE OF THE DUTCHESSE.
11. THE HOUSE OF FAME, 3 Books.
12. CHAUCER'S DREAM.
13. THE FLOWER AND THE LEAF.
14. THE LEGEND OF GOOD WOMEN, 9 Examples.
15. THE COMPLAINT OF MARS AND VENUS.
16. OF THE CUCKOW AND THE NIGHTINGALE.

Of these compositions the Canterbury Tales is much the best known. The plot is doubtless taken from the Decameron of Boccaccio. A company of pilgrims, twenty-nine in number, on their way to the shrine of Thomas à Becket, at Canterbury, pass the night at the Tabard Inn at Southwark, where they make the acquaintance of our poet, the narrator, who promised to bear them company, their destination being the same as his own:

"Beelle, that in that season on a day,
In Southwark at the Tabard as I lay,
Redy to wendon on my pilgrimage
To Canterbury with devoute corage,
At night was come into that hostelrye
Wel nine and twenty in a compaignie
Of sundry folk. . . .
And shortly, when the sun was gon to rest,
So hadde I spoken with hem everich on,
That I was of hir felawship anon
And made forword early for to rise,
To take oure way thar as I you devise."

The Host of the Tabard offers to accompany the party, and suggests to them that they should divert each other with entertaining stories, and that on their return,

"Which of you that bereth him best of alle,
That is to sayn, that telleth in this cas
Tales of best sentence and most solas,
Shal have a souper at youre alleie cost."

The proposition was joyfully accepted, the tales were told; and truly, however much there may have been of pilgrimage, there was but little of penance, in that merry journeying! About seventy-five years after the death of this great poet, Caxton, the first English printer, pub. The Book of the Tales of Cauntyrburye, without date; supposed to have been printed about 1475. Only two perfect copies of this edition are known,—one in the Library of George III. in the British Museum; the other in Merton College. The first edition of the entire works of Chaucer

(with the exception of the Ploughman's Tale, which was first printed in the edition of 1542) was pub. by Thomas Godfrey, Lon., 1532, fol. See particulars of early editions in Dibdin's Typographical Antiquities, and Lowndes's Bibl. Manual. The edit. of 1721, fol., has a Glossary and a Life by Urry. By far the best edition of the Canterbury Tales is by Thomas Tyrwhitt, who prefixed to them an Essay on Chaucer's Language and Versification, and an Introductory Discourse, which, with the learned Notes and Glossary, add much to the value of the work. Tyrwhitt's first edit. was pub. Lon., 1775, '78, 5 vols. 8vo; 2d edit., Oxf., 1798, 2 vols. 4to. In the impression of 1822 the Glossary is under an alphabet, and the general arrangement is improved. The reader should procure Mr. Moxon's beautiful edit. of the Poetical Works of Chaucer, (which includes Tyrwhitt's Essay, &c.) last impression 1852, r. 8vo. The following works should not be neglected:

Todd's Illustrations of the Lives and Writings of Gower and Chaucer, Lon., 1810, 8vo.

"A curious work, displaying great industry of investigation. Mr. Todd's researches into English literature have been equalled by few of our lexicographers or commentators."

Godwin's Life of Chaucer, Lon., 1803, 2 vols. 4to.

"Considerable praise is due to Mr. Godwin for the comments on the works of our bard, which occur in these volumes."—Edin. Rev.

An 8vo vol. entitled Chaucer's Poems Modernized, by Wordsworth, R. H. Home, Leigh Hunt, and others, has been highly commended, and an English critic declares that "Too much applause cannot be bestowed upon the projection and execution of this design."

But we confess that we have no taste for these rehearsals of ancient delicacies. Their tendency is to increase reading at the expense of knowledge. What will a reader of a modern Chaucer know of glorious old "Geffary Chaucer," who wrote "dyuers Workes which were neuer in Print before?" See Godfrey's edition; the first, 1532, fol.

If any man or woman will not take the trifling trouble which is necessary to understand Chaucer's antique orthography,—let them be ignorant. The last "Minerva" novel will prove metal more attractive to such painstaking "students of English Literature."

Mr. Saunders pub. a vol. in 1845, entitled Chaucer's Canterbury Tales Explained, and rendered more intelligible with the help of modern prose. This work treats of Gaelic construction, and other matters connected with antique spelling. Charles Cowden Clarke has given to the world Tales from Chaucer in prose, in imitation of Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare; also a vol. entitled The Riches of Chaucer, 1839, 8vo. There is also a Life by Singer, and one by Nicolas.

It will be proper to gratify the reader with some quotations from ancient and modern critics referring to the merits of the Father of English Poetry:

"And upon hys Imaginacyon
He made also the Tales of Canterbury,
Some very toonys, and some glad and merry,
And many other bokes, doubtles,
He dyd compyle, whose godly name
In printed bokes doth remaine in fame."

HAWES: Pastime of Pleasure, c. 14.

"Yet what a time hath he wrested from time,
And won upon the mightie waste of daies,
Unto the immortal honour of our clime:
That by his means came first adorned with bayes:
Unto the sacred reliques of whose rime
We yet are bound in zeal to offer praise."

DANIEL: Musophilus.

The usual titles by which Chaucer was complimented by his contemporaries were "The Chief Poete of Britanie," "The Flour of Poesie," &c.

"Malster Chaucer, that nobly enterprynged
How that our englysshe myght frechly be enued."

SKELTON: Garlande of Laurelle.

"So wise a man as our Chaucer is esteemed."—MILTON.

Among the warmest admirers of Chaucer in earlier days may be mentioned Gawin Douglass, Bishop of Dunkeld, Caxton, William Botteville, Leland, the great antiquary who honoured his memory with three copies of verses; Roger Ascham, Sir Philip Sydney, Speght, Stowe, John Fox, Camden, Sir Henry Savile, the illustrious Selden, Sir Francis Kynaston, &c. In his close imitation of Chaucer in his Temple of Fame, Pope has paid him the highest of compliments. The learned Dr. Skinner complains that

"The poet Chaucer set the worst example, who by bringing whole shoals of French words into our language, which was but too much adulterated before, through the effects of the Norman Conquest, deprived it almost wholly of its native grace and splendour, laying on paint over its pure complexion, and, for a beautiful face, substituted a downright mask."—Trans. from the Latin original. See Biog. Brit.

This charge is summarily disposed of by Mr. Tyrwhitt in his Essay on the Language and Versification of Chaucer:

"I cannot help observing from a contemporary Historian, that several years before that great event, [the Norman Conquest,] the language of France had been introduced into the Court of England, and from thence among the people."

After proceeding with an exposition of this statement, Mr. Tyrwhitt remarks:

"From what has been said I think we may fairly conclude, that the English language must have imbibed a strong tincture of the French, long before the age of Chaucer, and consequently that he ought not to be charged as the importer of words and phrases which he only used after the example of his predecessors, and in common with his contemporaries. This was the real fact, and is capable of being demonstrated to any one, who will take the trouble of comparing the writings of Chaucer with those of Robert of Gloucester and Robert of Brunne who both lived before him, and with those of Sir John Mandeville and Wicliff who lived at the same time with him."

The censures of Verstegan and Skinner are thus rebuked. Mr. Tyrwhitt also contends that the verse in which the Canterbury Tales are written, although apparently irregular, is in fact as correctly rhythmical as the verse now used. We do not now pronounce the final e in many words in which it was sounded in Chaucer's time. This of itself is an important item in the consideration how far Chaucer is to be censured for irregularities in rhythm. The following remarks of Mr. Tyrwhitt are entitled to great weight:

"In discussing this question we should always have in mind, that the correctness and harmony of an English verse depends entirely upon its being composed of a certain number of syllables, and its having the accents of those syllables properly placed. In order, therefore, to form any judgment of the Versification of Chaucer, it is necessary that we should know the syllabical value, if I may use the expression, of his words, and the accentual value of his syllables, as they were commonly pronounced in his time; for without that knowledge, it is not more probable that we should determine justly upon the exactness of his metres, than that we should be able to cast up rightly an account stated in coins of a former age, of whose correct rate and determination we are totally ignorant."

We commend these observations to some of our modern index-critics.

Dryden's comment is perfectly correct:

"The verse of Chaucer, I confess is not harmonious to us; they who lived with him, and some time after him, thought it musical, &c."

And the reason is perfectly obvious; but we do not wonder that Dryden refused to believe all that Speght claimed for Chaucer's versification. Mr. Tyrwhitt's theory (which was that of Gray, also) was generally concurred in until the appearance of Dr. Nott's edition of the poems of Surrey and Wyatt. Many considered that Doctor N. had demonstrated the arguments of the former to be erroneous. But we have already lingered sufficiently long upon a hydra-headed subject, and the reader must pursue the investigation by a reference to the authorities cited, and to Mr. Hallam's Literary History of Europe. Mr. Warton's illustrations in the following lines are well worthy of quotation:

"I consider Chaucer as a genial day in an English spring. A brilliant sun enlivens the face of nature with an unusual lustre: the sudden appearance of cloudless skies, and the unexpected warmth of a tepid atmosphere, after the gloom and the inclemencies of a tedious winter, fill our hearts with the visionary prospect of a speedy summer; and we fondly anticipate a long continuance of gentle gales and vernal serenity. But winter returns with redoubled horrors: the clouds condense more formidably than before; and those tender buds and early blossoms, which were called forth by the transient gleam of a temporary sunshine, are nipped by frosts, and torn by tempests."—THOS. WARTON: History of Eng. Poetry.

Dr. Joseph Warton, in his Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, remarks that Chaucer excels as much in the pathetic and sublime as he does in his manner of treating light and ridiculous subjects.

"I take unceasing delight in Chaucer. His manly cheerfulness is especially delicious to me in my old age. How exquisitely tender he is, yet how perfectly free from the least touch of sickly melancholy, or morbid drooping."—S. T. COLERIDGE; and see Hippisley's Early English Literature.

Mr. Campbell concludes his essay upon Chaucer with a remark which the admirer of the poet will fully confirm:

"After four hundred years have closed over the mirthful features which formed the living originals of the poet's descriptions, [in the Canterbury Tales,] his pages impress the fancy with the momentary credence that they are still alive; as if Time had rebuilt his ruins, and were re-acting the last scenes of existence."—Essay on English Poetry.

"In elocution and elegance, in harmony and perspicuity of versification, Chaucer surpasses his predecessors in an infinite proportion; his genius was universal, and adapted to themes of unbounded variety; and his merit was not less in painting familiar manners with humour and propriety, than in moving the passions, and representing the beautiful or grand objects of nature, with grace and sublimity."—THOS. WARTON.

Like many others who have given their thoughts to the world, without an ever-present, proper sense of moral responsibility, Chaucer in his last hours bitterly bewailed some too well-remembered lines, "which dying" he vainly wished "to blot." "Wo is me, wo is me," he exclaimed in that solemn hour, "that I cannot recall and annul those things which I have written: but alas! they are now continued from man to man, and I cannot do what I desire!" One thing, however, he could do: from the depths of his sincere repentance and hearty contrition, he could send forth a warning voice to his fellow-men, urging them to a submissive endurance of earthly trials, and a constant reference in their actions to that enduring habitation which the Judge of all the earth hath prepared for them who "by patient continuance in well-doing, look for glory, honour, and immortality." To these wholesome meditations of the dying poet, we owe the "Good Counsellor" of Chaucer, by the quotation of the conclusion of which we shall help to promote the design of the author, and perhaps confer no inconsiderable benefit upon some thoughtless reader:

"That thee is sent receive in buxomnesse.
The wrastling of this world asketh a fall,
Here is no home, here is but wilderness,
Forth, pilgrime! forth, beast, out of thy stall!
Looke up on high, and thanke God of all!
Weve thy lusts, and let thy ghost thee lede,
And trouth thee shall deliver, it is no drede."

Cheke, Sir John, 1514-1557, a native of Cambridge, was admitted into St. John's College in 1531, and applied himself with such zeal to the study of the Greek language—then much neglected in England—that about 1540, when the king founded a Greek professorship in the University of Cambridge, Cheke, only 26 years of age, was chosen the first professor. His persevering efforts to reform the English pronunciation of Greek were crowned with success, although violently opposed by Bishop Gardiner and others. In 1544 he was appointed one of the Latin tutors to Prince Edward. He was a zealous advocate of the Protestant Reformation, and interested in the settlement of the crown upon Lady Jane Grey. Upon the accession of Queen Mary he was imprisoned in the Tower, from whence the queen's pardon released him, and he travelled for some time on the Continent. But he was too important a personage to be overlooked by the persecutors of the day; and being arrested near Brussels, was sent to London, again imprisoned in the Tower, and only escaped martyrdom by an open recantation of the principles of the Reformation. The remorse which followed this step soon brought him to the grave, and he was gathered to his fathers at the early age of 43. England could have better afforded the loss of many courtiers than of this great man! Sir John left many works in MS., a catalogue of which we find in Strype. His publications consist almost entirely of translations from the Greek into the Latin tongue, and from English into Latin, &c. A Latin trans. of two of St. Chrysostom's Homilies, 1543, 4to; of six ditto, 1545, 8vo. The Hurt of Sedition, 1549, 8vo; and in Holinshed's Chronicle, anno 1549. Bucer; vide Bucer's Opuscula Anglicana; a Latin trans. of Cranmer's Book on the Lord's Supper, 1553. The New Testament in English, after the Greek trans., 1550, 8vo. Cheselden, William, 1688-1752, an eminent surgeon and anatomist, a native of Leicestershire, studied under Cowper, the celebrated anatomist, and Ferriè, the head surgeon of St. Thomas's Hospital. "The work received a more judicious censure from the celebrated Haller, who, whilst he candidly pointed out its errors, paid the writer that tribute of applause which he so justly deserved. Heister, likewise, in his Compendium of Anatomy, has done justice to its merit."—Biog. Brit.

To Gouthe's trans. of Le Dran's Operations in Surgery, Cheselden added 21 plates and some valuable remarks. Cheselden made many improvements in surgery, and banished the complicated French instruments formerly in use. Sharpe acknowledges his great obligations to him. Pope held him in high esteem:

"I wondered a little at your quere, who Cheselden was. It shews that the truest merit does not travel so far any way as on the wings of poetry. He is the most noted and most deserving man in the whole profession of chyrurgery; and has saved the lives of thousands by his manner of cutting for the stone."—Letter from Pope to Swift.

We find the worthy surgeon also celebrated in the verses of his poetical admirer:

"To keep these limbs, and to preserve these eyes,

Chesterfield, Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of, 1694-1773, was the eldest son of Philip, third Earl of Chesterfield, by Lady Elizabeth Saville, daughter of George, Marquis of Halifax. In his 18th year he was entered of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, where he studied to so much purpose that he left the University an excellent classical scholar. He was returned for St. Germain's in Cornwall in the first Parliament of the reign of George I., and in the national councils, as well as in the diplomatic positions which he afterwards occupied, displayed considerable energy of character. As a gentleman, a courtier, and a patron of literature, he aspired to fill the first rank, and his ambition was gratified. Johnson's suit to the "Conqueror of the World," and the celebrated letter which closed their distant acquaintance, is well known. They were not calculated to be agreeable to each other. The earl considered the lexicographer to be no better than "a respectable Hottentot," and the awkward scholar styled the nobleman "A Wit among Lords, and a Lord among Wits." Johnson's letter to his lordship must be condemned as a piece of great injustice. The earl is now best known by his Letters to his Son, (who died at an early age, in 1768,) 1774, 2 vols. 4to; often reprinted; which were not intended for publication. They display much knowledge of the worst part of the world, and little taste for any thing of a more elevated character.

"Those who wish to see the superiority of dissembling over openness demonstrated with admirable force, may consult the philosopher of flattery and dissimulation."—DR. VAILLANT.

"It was not to be wondered at that they had so great a sale, considering that they were the letters of a statesman, a wit, one who had been in the mouths of mankind, one long accustomed verbum volutari per ora. . . Does not Lord Chesterfield give precepts for uniting wickedness and the graces? . . . Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his Son, I think, might be made a very pretty book. Take out the immorality, and it should be put into the hands of every gentleman."—DR. JOHNSON.

What Johnson desired—an expurgated Chesterfield—has been prepared by Dr. Trusler (Principles of Politeness) and others. The most epigrammatic description which Johnson gave of the Letters, for obvious reasons we have not quoted.

It is not a little curious that these Letters should have been repub. in Boston as early as 1779; five years after the first London edition. His lordship's Miscellaneous Works were pub. in 1777, Lon., 2 vols. 4to; Appendix, 1778, 4to, (of doubtful authenticity.) Characters, 1777, 12mo. Supplement to his Letters, 1777, '87, 4to. Letters, including many now first published from the original MSS. Edited with Notes, by Lord Mahon, Lon., 1845, 4 vols. 8vo. The papers upon Johnson's Dictionary, which elicited the celebrated response, are Nos. 100 and 101 in The World. Some verses of his composition are in the miscellanies of Dodsley, Almon, Debret, &c. Pope once borrowed his diamond ring, and wrote on the window of an inn:

"Accept a miracle instead of wit,

See two dull lines by Stanhope's pencil writ."

"Lord Chesterfield's eloquence, though the fruit of study and imitation, was in a great measure his own. Equal to most of his contemporaries in eloquence and perspicuity, perhaps surpassed by some in extensiveness and strength, he could have no competitors in choice of imagery, taste, urbanity, and graceful irony."—DR. MATT.

Chillingworth, William, 1602–1644, was the son of William Chillingworth, Mayor of Oxford. In 1618 he was admitted to Trinity College, of which he became Fellow in 1628. He was noted at an early age for great application to study, and that acuteness in controversy which distinguished him in later years.

"He was then observed to be no dudge at his study, but being a man of great parts, would do much in a little time when he settled to it. He would often walk in the College grove, and con-temple; but when he met with any scholar there, he would enter into discourse, and dispute with him, purposely to facilitate, and make the way of wrangling common with him, which was a fashion used in those days, especially among the disputing theologians or among those that set themselves apart purposely for Divinity. But upon the change of the times, occasioned by the Puritan, that way, forsooth, was accounted boyish and pedagogical."—Wood's Athen. Oxon.

He paid some attention to poetry, and was considered by Sir John Suckling worthy of a place in his Session of the Poets:

"There was Selden, and he sat hard by the chair,
Wainman not far off, which was very fair,
Sands with Townshead, for they kept no order,
Digby and Chillingworth a little further."

Chillingworth's reputation for uncommon powers of mind drew upon him the attention of the famous Jesuit, John Fisher, alias John Perse, (his true name,) and by dexterously plying him with his arguments in proof of the infallibility of the Church of Rome, he persuaded Chillingworth to embrace the religion of that communion, and to go over to the College of the Jesuits, at Douay. But his godfather, Laud, then Bishop of London, in his correspondence with him, argued with such effect against his new opinions, that in two months from the time he left England, he returned home, and upon due examination of the questions between the two churches, he returned to the communion of the Church of England. If Laud had done nothing more than this for the Protestant cause, he deserved better treatment than he has received from those who have charged him with an inclination towards Popery.

As might have been anticipated, Chillingworth now became engaged in several controversies with his late fellow-churchmen. A Jesuit named Matthias Wilson published in 1630, under the name of Edward Knott, a little treatise called Charity Mistaken, &c. Dr. Potter answered this in 1633. The next year the Jesuit published a rejoinder, entitled Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholics. It was in answer to this treatise, that in 1638 Chillingworth published his great work, The Religion of Protestants a safe Way to Salvation, &c. This book immediately became so popular, that two editions were published in five months. After overcoming some scruples relative to the subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles, he was promoted to the chancellorship of Salisbury, with the prebend of Brixworth in Northamptonshire annexed. He was a warm adherent of the Royal party, and was present at the siege of Gloucester in 1643, where he made some military suggestions, which were not acted on, for the very excellent reason that the successful enemy prevented the opportunity. He was taken prisoner shortly after by the parliamentary forces, while suffering under sickness at Arundel Castle: he was conveyed to the Bishop's palace at Chichester, where he died about the 30th of January, 1644.

Chillingworth's Nine Sermons on Occasional Subjects were pub. Lon., 1664. The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, in 1644. Letter giving an account why he deserted the Church of Rome, in 1704. In 1725 there was published by M. Des Maizeaux, an Historical and Critical Account of his Life. An edition of his works appeared in 1684, fol.; and the tenth edit. with corrections and improvements was pub. in 1742, fol. New edit., Oxford Univ. Press, in 3 vols. 8vo, 1838. Contents: Vol. I. Life; Charity maintained by Catholics, with Prefaces. II. Charity maintained, (continued.) III. Sermons; Addit. Discourses; Answer to Rushworth's Dialogues; Against Punishing Crimes with Death; Index to Charity maintained.

Wood declares that the Royal party in Chichester looked upon the impertinent discourses of Chyennell (a Nonconformist divine, who attended Chillingworth in his last illness,) as "a shortening of his days." This man published a work called Chillingworthi Novissima: or the Sickness, Heresy, Death, and Burial of William Chillingworth, 1644, concerning which an eminent authority remarks:

"One of the most villainous books that ever was printed: it is the quintessence of railing, and ought to be kept, or regarded, as the pattern and standard of that sort of writing; as the man he spends it upon, for that of good nature, and clear and strong argument."—JOHN LOCKE.

We might fill many pages with encomiastic opinions of our author, and his principal work.

"Hobbes of Malmesbury would often say that he was like a lusty, fighting fellow, that did drive his enemies before him, but would often give his own party smart back blows; and it was the current opinion of the University that he and Lucius, Lord Falkland, had such extraordinary clear reason, that, if the great Turk or devil were to be converted, they were able to do it."

"I know not how it comes to pass, but so it is, that every one that offers to give a reasonable account of his faith, and to establish religion upon rational principles, is presently branded for a Socinian; of which we have a sad instance in that incomparable person Mr. Chillingworth, the glory of this age and nation."—ARCHBISHOP TILLOTSON.

Mr. Locke recommends the last-quoted author as a pattern for the attainment of the art of speaking clearly, and then proceeds to remark:

"Besides perspicuity, there must be also right reasoning, without which perspicuity serves but to expose the speaker. And for attaining of this, I should propose the constant reading of Chillingworth, who, by his example, will teach both perspicuity, and the way of right reasoning, better than any book that I know, and therefore will deserve to be read upon that account over and over again, not to say any thing of his argument."—Some Thoughts concerning Reading and Study for a Gentleman.

Lord Clarendon tells us that

"Mr. Chillingworth was a man of so great subtilty of understanding, and so rare a temper in debate, that as it was impossible to provoke him into any passion, so it was very difficult to keep a man's self from being a little discomposed by his sharpness, and quickness of argument, and instances, in which he had a rare facility, and a great advantage over all the men I ever knew."

"Those who desire to know the doctrines of the Church of England, must read especially Chillingworth's admirable book, The Religion of Protestants."—MOSHEM.

Chillingworth's "new creed was built on the principle, that the Bible is our sole judge, and private reason our sole interpreter; and he most ably maintains this position in the Religion of a Protestant, a book which is still esteemed the most solid defence of the Reformation."—EDWARD GIBSON.

He was "the best reasoner and the most acute logician of his age."—DR. REID.

"His great excellency consisted in his acquired logic, the syllogisms of Aristotle and Crankenthorp having been a principal part of his studies."—DR. BARLOW.

"In testimony of his true conversion, he wrote a book entitled, The Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation, against Mr. Knott the Jesuit. I will not say, 'Male nodo malus quærendus est cuneus,' but affirm no person better qualified than this author with all necessary accomplishments to encounter a Jesuit. It is commonly reported that Dr. Prideaux compared his book to a lamprey; fit for food, if the venomous sting were taken out of the back thereof: a passage, in my opinion, inconsistent with the doctor's approbation, prefixed in the beginning of his book."—Fuller's Worthies.

Lord Mansfield mentions Chillingworth as a perfect model of argumentation. Bishop Warburton observes that the student

Will see all the school jargon of the subtle Jesuit incomparably exposed; and the long dispute between the two churches, for the first time, placed upon its proper immovable ground, the Bible alone."

"If you would have your son reason well, let him read Chillingworth."—LOCKE: On Education.

For a comparison between Chillingworth, Barrow, Taylor, and Hooker, see BARROW.

Mr. Hallam, in comparing Chillingworth with his polemical adversary Knott, remarks that

"Knott is by no means a despicable writer; he is concise, polished, and places in an advantageous light the great leading arguments of his Church. Chillingworth, with a more diffuse and less elegant style, is greatly superior in impetuousity and warmth. In his long parenthetical periods, as in those of other old English writers; in his copiousness, which is never empty or tautological, there is an inartificial elegance, springing from strength of intellect and sincerity of feeling, that cannot fail to impress the reader. But his chief excellence is the close reasoning, which avoids every dangerous admission, and yields to no ambiguity of language. . . . The work of Chillingworth may at least be understood and appreciated without reference to any other; the condition, perhaps, of real superiority in all productions of the mind."—Introduction to the Literature of Europe.

Churchill, Lord. Letter to the King, fol.

Churchill, Charles, 1731-1764, a native of Westminster, of which parish his father was curate, was educated at Westminster School, and resided for a short time at Trinity College, Cambridge. A clandestine marriage at an early age indicated a want of prudence, which was afterwards manifested in a remarkable degree. In 1756 he was ordained priest by Bishop Sherlock, and two years later succeeded his father in the curacy and lectureship of St. John's at Westminster. About this time his parishioners were much shocked by the very unclerical deportment of their pastor, who was more frequently to be found at the theatre than in his library, and who neglected the society of grave and reverend prelates for companionship with some of the most dissipated "men about town." External decency soon followed forsaken principles, and the clergyman shortly appeared, to the wonder of the town, in a blue coat, ruffles, and gold-laced hat! He had already tried his powers as a poet. The Bard, written in 1759, was rejected by the booksellers, and The Conclave, a satire upon the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, was suppressed by the influence of Churchill's friends. In 1761, after being refused five guineas for The Rosciad—a satire upon the performers at Drury Lane and Covent-Garden theatres—he pub. it at his own risk in March, 1761. Its success surpassed his most extravagant hopes. The Critical Reviewers showed it no mercy, and Churchill retorted in The Apology. Dr. Pearce, the Dean of Westminster, took the triumphant and gratified author seriously to task for such dereliction from his professional duties and character. Churchill was in no mood to be reasoned with, and he at once resigned his post, and became an avowed man of the world—we are sorry to say in the worst sense of the term. He even deserted his wife, who had shared his privations in the straitened circumstances of earlier days, and thus walking "in the counsel of the ungodly," we soon find him occupying "the seat of the scorners," and casting off all fear of Heaven. That notorious profligate and abandoned debauchee, John Wilkes, was a proper mate for such an apostate, and in him Churchill confided as his Guide, Philosopher, and Friend. Wilkes made him pay for the honour of his company, and instigated him to write The Prophecy of Famine, a Scots Pastoral, 1763, 4to, which he said was sure to succeed, as it was at once personal, poetical, and political. It is a bitter satire against the Scottish nation. He had previously given to the world, Night, a Poem, 1761, 4to. The Ghost, in 4 Books, 1762, '63, 4to. Epistle to Hogarth, 1763, 4to. (The painter had represented Churchill in the form of a bear, dressed canonically, with ruffles at his paws, and holding a pot of porter.) The Conference, a Poem, 1763, 4to. To The Prophecy of Famine succeeded The Duellist, 1763, 4to. The Author; Gotham; The Candidate; Independence; The Times; Farwell; all 1764, 4to. The Journey was pub. after his death; also a vol. of sermons. In 1764 Churchill visited the Continent to embrace his friend Wilkes, who had "Left his country for his country's good," and was residing in France. The friends met at Boulogne; but almost amidst the first congratulations, Churchill was attacked with the military fever, and after a few days' illness he was summoned to his "dread account," at the early age of 34. It was reported that his last exclamation was, "What a fool I have been!" Wilkes denied this: we should not have expected him to admit it, if undoubtedly true. His own character, as well as Churchill's, was at stake. That the erring poet experienced remorse, if not repentance, for his transgressions, may be fairly inferred from some memorable lines in The Conference:

"The tale which angry Conscience tells,
When she with more than tragic horror swells
Each circumstance of guilt: when stern, but true,
She brings bad actions forth into review,
And, like the dread hand-writing on the wall,
Bids late remorse awake at Reason's call:
Armed at all points, bids scorpion vengeance pass,
And to the mind holds up reflection's glass,—
The mind which starting heaves the heart-felt groan,
And hates that firm she knows to be her own."

A volume of Churchill's Sermons on the Lord's Prayer (by some attributed to C.'s father) were pub. in 1765, 8vo. Prefixed is a satirical dedication (which induced the publishers to give £250 for the ten sermons) to Bishop Warburton, in which that dignitary is addressed as "Doctor, Dean, Bishop, Gloster, and My Lord." An edit. of his works was pub. in 1754, 4to; 1774, 4 vols. 12mo; with Life by W. Tooke, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. Churchill's poetry attracted little attention after his death, and is now almost entirely neglected.

"No English poet had ever enjoyed so excessive and so short-lived a popularity; and, indeed, no one seems more thoroughly to have understood his own powers; there is no indication in any of his pieces that he could have done any thing better than the thing he did. To Wilkes he said that nothing came out till he began to be pleased with it himself; but, to the public, he boasted of the haste and carelessness with which his verses were poured forth. . . .

'When the mad fit comes on I seize the pen;

Rough as they run, the rapid thoughts set down,

Rough as they run, discharge them on the town.'

Cowper was a great admirer of the poetry of a man whose principles—or want of them—he could not but detest:

"He is, indeed, a careless writer for the most part; but where shall we find in any of those authors who finish their works with the exactness of a Flemish pencil, those bold and daring strokes of fancy, those numbers so hazardingly ventured, and so happily finished, the matter so compressed, and yet so clear, and the colour so sparingly laid on, and yet with such a beautiful effect? In short, it is not the least praise that he is never guilty of those faults as a writer, which he lays to the charge of others. A proof that he did not charge from a borrowed standard, or from rules laid down by critics, but that he was qualified to do it by his own native powers, and his great superiority of genius."

"Churchill may be ranked as a satirist immediately after Pope and Dryden, with perhaps a greater share of humour than either. He has the bitterness of Pope, with less wit to atone for it, but no mean share of the fine manner and energetic plainness of Dryden."

"To these papers Dr. Churchill has appended notes, embodying whatever information has been laid before the profession since their author's time. He has also prefixed to the Essays on Puerperal Fever, which occupy the larger portion of the volume, an interesting historical sketch of the principal epidemics of that disease. The whole forms a very valuable collection of papers, by professional writers of eminence, on some of the most important accidents to which the puerperal female is liable."—American Journal of Medical Sciences.

Most cordially and earnestly, therefore, do we commend it to our professional brethren, and we feel assured that the stamp of their approbation will in due time be impressed upon it. After an attentive perusal of its contents, we hesitate not to say that it is one of the most comprehensive ever written upon the diseases of children, and that, for copiousness of reference, extent of research, and perspicuity of detail, it is scarcely to be equalled, and not to be excelled, in any language."—Dublin Quarterly Journal.

The American student, especially, should also procure M. Du Perier's General History of Voyages and Travels throughout the Old and New World, Lon., 1707, 8vo.

Poverty and poetry his tomb doth inclose;
Wherefore, good neighbours, be merry in prose.'

Cibber, Colley, 1671–1757, Poet Laureate to George II., made his appearance as an actor at the early age of 18, but not meeting with the success he anticipated, he determined to turn author, and in 1695 produced his first play, Love's Last Shift, or the Fool in Fashion. The author performed the part of Sir Novelty Fashion, and in both capacities he was rewarded by great applause. In 1704 was acted his best piece, The Careless Husband, in which Cibber and Mrs. Oldfield enacted the principal characters. He injured himself in the eyes of the Jacobites, in 1717, by his Comedy of the Nonjuror. He was quite consoled, however, for their enmity, by receiving a pension from Geo. I. of £200, being promoted to the post of Laureate in 1730. In this year he quitted the stage; but appeared again on special occasions. An edit. of his Plays appeared in 1721, 2 vols. 4to; and a later one in 1777, 5 vols. 8vo. A list of 30 plays, with which he had more or less to do, will be found in Biog. Dramat. His Apology for his Life presents a very curious picture of state affairs in his day. It was pub. in 1740, 4to; 1756, 2 vols. 12mo; new edit., with explanatory Notices, by E. Bellchambers, 1822, 8vo.

Pope had made himself ridiculous, as he generally did in his petty malice, by making Theobald the hero of the Dunciad, because he had convicted Pope of gross ignorance of Shakspeare. He now made himself ridiculous a second time, by exalting to that dull eminence, Colley Cibber, one of the wittiest and most sprightly authors of the day. Cibber's letter of remonstrance to Pope was unanswerable. His ambition led him into a grave error, when it induced him to undertake such a criticism as The Character and Conduct of Cicero considered; pub. Lon., 1747, 4to. Fielding took great delight in ridiculing him. Cibber's name is frequently introduced in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"BOSWELL: 'Cibber was a man of observation.' JOHNSON: 'I think not.' BOSWELL: 'You will allow his Apology to be well done.' JOHNSON: 'Very well done, to be sure, sir. That book is a striking proof of the justice of Pope's remark:

'Each might his several province well command,
Would all but stoop to what they understand.'"

Swift was so much pleased with Cibber's Apology for his Life, that he sat up all night to read it: upon hearing which, Cibber, it is said, shed tears for joy.

Cibber, Susanna Maria, d. 1766, a celebrated actress, sister of Dr. Arne, and wife of Theophilus, son of Colley Cibber, trans. in 1752, The Oracle of St. Foix.

Cibber, Theophilus, 1703–1758, son of Colley Cibber, bore even a worse moral character than his father, which was quite unnecessary. He was an actor, and married first an actress of the name of Johnson, and, secondly, Miss Arne, (see above.) The Lover, C., 1730. Patie and Peggie, B. O., 1730. The Mock Officer, F., 1733. Other Dramatic pieces, and alterations of Henry VI., and Romeo and Juliet, from Shakspeare. The following work appeared under his name, The Lives of the Poets of G. Britain and Ireland, from the time of Dean Swift, Lon., 1753, 5 vols. 12mo: but we have direct evidence that Cibber was not sole author of this work:

"I take this opportunity to testify, that the book called Cibber's Lives of the Poets was not written, nor, I believe, ever seen, by either of the Cibbers, but was the work of Robert Shiels, a native of Scotland, a man of a very acute understanding, though with little scholastic education, who, not long after the publication of his work, died in London of a consumption. His life was virtuous and his end was pious. Theophilus Cibber, then a prisoner for debt, imparted, as I was told, his name for ten guineas. The manuscript of Shiels is now in my possession."—DR. JOHNSON: Life of Hammond.

Here Johnson is much in error, for we have Griffith's (the publisher) testimony that Cibber did revise, correct, and add to the MS., and probably wrote some of the Lives. See Boswell's Johnson; and for publications connected with the Cibbers, father and son, see Lowndes's Bibl. Manual.

Clarendon, Edward Hyde, Earl of, 1608-1673, one of the most illustrious characters of English history, was the third son of Henry Hyde, of Dinton, Wiltshire, where he was born on the 16th of February. He was entered of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1622, where he remained one year; after which he removed to the Middle Temple, and pursued his legal studies under the direction of his uncle, Nicholas Hyde, afterwards Chief Justice of the King's Bench. In his twenty-first year he married the daughter of Sir George Ayliffe, who only survived the union six months. Three years afterwards he married the daughter of Sir Thomas Aylesbury, Master of Requests. He informs us in his Life, that he made it a rule to select for his associates none but persons distinguished for their rank, fortune, or accomplishments. We need not be surprised, therefore, to find among his "list of friends," stars of the first magnitude:—Ben Jonson, Selden, May, Sir Kenelm Digby, Edmund Waller, Lord Falkland, Sheldon, Morley, Earle, Hales, Chillingworth, &c. (See Memorials of his own life.) The patronage of the Marquis of Hamilton and Archbishop Laud was of great value to the ambitious aspirant for brilliant honours. In 1640 he was elected a member of Parliament, and as a Royalist, waged stern war with Hampden and other representatives of popular pretensions. His zeal was not overlooked, and in 1643 he was raised to the high position of Lord Chancellor of the Exchequer, sworn a member of the Privy Council, and knighted. When affairs had taken so grave a turn that it was deemed prudent to send the prince, afterwards Charles II., out of the way of danger, Hyde was his companion, but remained in Jersey when the prince sailed for France. During this retirement of two years, he wrote portions of his two celebrated works, The History of the Rebellion, and Account of his own Life. His studies were interrupted in 1648, by directions to attend the prince at Paris. He found him at the Hague, where the news soon arrived of the murder of King Charles I. Whilst on the Continent, Clarendon chiefly resided at Madrid and Antwerp. In 1657, King Charles II., still an exile, rewarded the fidelity of his follower by creating him Lord High Chancellor of England. But he suffered greatly from poverty at different times, having, as he tells us, "neither clothes nor fire to preserve me from the sharpness of the season." At the Restoration he displayed great sagacity in reconciling the hostile parties who composed the strength of the kingdom, and it was mainly owing to his counsels that the Republicans escaped the bitter chalice which they had commended to the lips of the persecuted and down-trodden Royalists. In 1660, Hyde was chosen Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and created a peer by the title of Baron Hyde, of Hindon, in Wiltshire, to which were added in 1661, the titles of Viscount Cornbury in Oxfordshire, and Earl of Clarendon in Wiltshire. Such greatness must needs excite the envy of the malicious; and this ill will was heightened by the announcement of the marriage of his daughter to the Duke of York, afterwards James II. This event was unknown to Clarendon until its publicity became a matter of necessity, and Charles II. did not permit it to deprive him of his favour. In 1663, the Earl of Bristol exhibited a charge of High Treason against Clarendon, the gravamen of which was an alleged intention to favour the introduction of Popery into Great Britain. There were other causes of resentment—the king's neglect of public affairs, the extravagance of the Court, &c.—which prudence did not permit to be openly exposed. In 1667 he was removed from his post of Chancellor, and shortly afterwards received the king's orders to leave the country. He sailed for France, November 29, 1667, and on the 19th of the ensuing month an act of banishment shut the door to all hopes of return to his native land. He resided for four years at Montpellier, passed some time at Moulins, and finally took up his residence at Rouen, where he died, December 9, 1674. There was nothing now to excite the animosity of his foes, and his body was permitted to rest in the land he had so faithfully served, and by which he had been so ungratefully rewarded. Helies, Lord Clarendon had by his second wife four sons and two daughters: Henry, the second Earl of Clarendon, (q. v.) d. in 1709; Lawrence, Earl of Rochester, d. in 1711; Edward and James died unmarried. Frances was married to Thomas Keightly of Hertingfordbury; Anne married James, Duke of York, and was the mother of Mary and Anne, Queens of England.

"Lister's Life of Clarendon is not the ingenious or eloquent pleading of an advocate, but the severe and enlightened neutrality of a judge. See LISTER, THOMAS H. To these valuable volumes should be added The Correspondence and Diaries of Henry Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, and Lawrence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, &c., by S. W. Singer, Esq., Lon., 1828, 2 vols. r. 4to. (See below.) The reader will also be interested in An Historical Inquiry respecting the Character of Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, by the Hon. Agar Ellis, Lon., 1827, 8vo. Mr. Ellis arrives at the conclusion, which will be rejected by many of his readers, that Clarendon was an unprincipled man of talent. This notice of Mr. Ellis's opinions may properly introduce some quotations from various authorities respecting the character of Clarendon as a statesman and an author:

"I cannot but let you know the incredible satisfaction I have taken in reading my late Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, so well and so unexpectedly well written—the preliminary so like that of the noble Polybius, leading us by the courts, avenues, and porches, into the fabric; the style masculine; the characters so just, and tempered without the least impediment of passion or tincture of revenge, yet with such natural and lively touches as show his lordship well knew not only the persons' outside, but their very interiors."—Letters of John Evelyn to Samuel Pepys, Jan. 20, 1702, '03. See Diary and Correspondence of Samuel Pepys, Lon., 1854, 4 vols. 8vo.

"His lordship died an exile, and in the displeasure of his majeaty, and others who envied his rise and fortune—from breves Populi Romani amores! But I shall say no more of his ministry, and what was the pretence of his fall, than that we have lived to see great revolutions. The buffons, parasites, pimps, and concubines, who supplanted him at court, came to nothing not long after, and were as little pitied. 'Tis something yet too early to publish the names of his delators, for fear of one's teeth. But time will speak truth, and sure I am the event has made it good. Things were infinitely worse managed since his disgrace."—Evelyn to Pepys. See Diary and Correspondence of J. Evelyn, Lon., 1852, 4 vols. 8vo.

It is not to be denied that many of his lordship's contemporaries entertained a very different opinion of him; and Mr. Agar Ellis, among modern writers, accuses him of treachery, as well as imbecility, in the management of state affairs.

We continue our quotations:

"The Earl of Clarendon, upon the Restoration, made it his business to depress everybody's merits to advance his own, and the king having gratified his vanity with high titles, found it necessary towards making a fortune in proportion to apply himself to other means than what the crown could afford."—LORD DARTMOUTH: Note on Burnet.

"Had Clarendon sought nothing but power, his power had never ceased. A corrupted court and a blinded populace were less the causes of the chancellor's fall, than an ungrateful king, who could not pardon his lordship's having refused to accept for him the slavery of his country. . . . Buckingham, Shaftesbury, Lauderdale, Arlington, and such abominable men, were the exchange which the nation made for my Lord Clarendon! . . . As an historian he seems more exceptionable. His majesty and eloquence, his power of painting characters, his knowledge of his subject, rank him in the first class of writers—yet he has both great and little faults."—HORACE WALPOLE: R. & N. Authors.

"He particularly excels in characters, which, if drawn with precision and elegance, are as difficult to the writers as they are agreeable to the readers of history. He is in this particular as unrivalled among the moderns as Tacitus among the ancients. . . . His style is rather careless than laboured; his periods are long, and frequently embarrassed by parentheses. Hence it is, that he is one of the most difficult of all authors to be read with an audible voice."—Granger's Biog. Hist.

"Clarendon will always be esteemed an entertaining writer, even independent of our curiosity to know the facts which he relates. His style is prolix and redundant, and suffocates us by the length of its periods; but it discovers imagination and sentiment, and pleases us at the same time that we disapprove of it. . . . An air of probity and goodness runs through the whole work, as these qualities did in reality embellish the whole life of the author. . . . Clarendon was always a friend to the liberty and constitution of his country."—HUME: Hist. of England.

"The lustre of all partial and even general Histories of England, was eclipsed, at the opening of the eighteenth century, by the History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars—from the powerful pen of Lord Clarendon: a work, of which the impressions and profits have increased in an equal ratio—and of which the popularity is built upon an imperishable basis. A statesman, a lawyer, and a philosopher in its most practical, and perhaps rational, sense, there is hardly any name which has reached us, encircled by purer rays of renown, than that of Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, or any which is more likely to go down to posterity in a more unsullied state of purity."—DR. DISBRI: Library Companion.

So Southey declares Clarendon to have been "the wisest and most upright of statesmen;" but Brodie, on the other hand, brands the Lord Chancellor as "a miserable sycophant and canting hypocrite." The remarks of Southey in a letter to Henry Taylor, Dec. 31, 1825, are well worth quoting:

"For an Englishman there is no single historical work with which it can be so necessary for him to be well and thoroughly acquainted as with Clarendon. I feel at this time perfectly assured, that if that book had been put into my hands in youth, it would have preserved me from all the political errors which I have outgrown. It may be taken for granted that — knows this book well. The more he reads concerning the history of these times, the more highly he will appreciate the wisdom and the integrity of Clarendon."—Southey's Life and Correspondence.

"Clarendon—a lover of the constitution, of his country, a patriotic statesman—is always interesting, and continually provides materials for the statesman and philosopher."—PROFESSOR SMYTH, of Cambridge.

"His 'Life' is full of a thousand curious anecdotes."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

"You ask me about reading history. You are quite right to read Clarendon; his style is a little long-winded, but, on the other hand, his characters may match those of the ancient historians, and one thinks they would know the very men if you were to meet them in society. Few English writers have the same precision either in describing the actors in great scenes, or the deeds which they performed. He was, you are aware, himself deeply engaged in the scenes which he depicts, and therefore colours them with the individual feeling, and sometimes, doubtless, with the partiality, of a partisan."—SIR WALLER SCOT'S Letter to his Son.

"The respect which we justly feel for Clarendon as a writer must not blind us to the faults which he committed as a statesman. . . . In some respects he was well fitted for his great place. No man wrote abler state papers. No man spoke with more weight and dignity in council and Parliament. No man was better acquainted with general maxims of statecraft. No man observed the varieties of character with a more discriminating eye. It must be added that he had a strong sense of moral and religious obligation, a sincere reverence for the laws of his country, and a conscientious regard for the honour and interest of the crown. But his temper was sour, arrogant, and impatient of opposition."—T. B. MACAULAY: Hist. of England, &c.

"He is excellent in every thing that he has performed with care: his characters are beautifully delineated, his sentiments have often a noble gravity, which the length of his periods, far too great in itself, seems to best; but in the general course of his narrative, he is negligent of grammar and perspicuity, with little choice of words, and, therefore, sometimes idiomatically, without ease or elegance. The official papers on the royal side, which are generally attributed to him, are written in a masculine and majestic tone, far superior to those of the Parliament."—HALLAM'S Introduction to Lib. Hist.; and in his Constitutional Hist. of England.

Clarendon, George William Frederick Villiers, Earl of, b. in 1800, is the present representative of the great Earl of Clarendon, and of the brother of Villiers, the favourite of James I. He succeeded to the title in 1838. He was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from 1847 to 1852, and has held several important offices. In 1846 he was appointed President of the Board of Trade. He was associated (when Mr. Villiers) with Dr. Bowring in drawing up the First Report on the Commercial Relations between France and Great Britain, 1834, fol.

Clarendon, Henry Hyde, second Earl of, 1638–1709, eldest son of the first earl, was carefully trained for public business by his illustrious parent. In resentment of the treatment to which his father was subjected, he joined the party which opposed the court, and made many speeches, some of which were preserved by Mr. Grey. On the accession of James II. he was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, but was superseded by Lord Tyrconnel. He refused to take the oaths to William III., and was for some time imprisoned in the Tower. After his release he lived in retirement until his death in 1709. "This Diary presents us with a picture of the manners of the age in which the writer lived. We may learn from it, that at the close of the seventeenth century a man of the first quality made it his constant practice to go to church, and could spend the day in society with his family and friends, without shaking his arm at a gaming-table, associating with jockies at Newmarket, or murdering time by a constant round of giddy dissipation, if not of criminal indulgence."—Editor's Preface.

In 1823 was pub. Clarendon Papers; viz.: The Correspondence of Henry Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, and of his Brother, Lawrence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, with the Diary of Lord Clarendon, 1687–90, and the Diary of Lord Rochester; pub. for the greater part for the first time from the original MSS., recently discovered by S. Clark, Lewis Gaylord, twin-brother of WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK, (poet), has obtained great popularity in his capacity of editor of the New York Knickerbocker Magazine. This excellent periodical was started in December 1832, by C. F. Hoffman, who was succeeded in the editorship in 1833, by Timothy Flint. Mr. Clark assumed the helm in 1834, and still (in 1858) maintains a post the duties of which few could discharge so well. So long as he offers the tempting display of an "Editor's Table" furnished with so great a profusion of good things, he may reasonably expect an abundant supply of delighted guests. It is no small recommendation of such fare, that each may partake to his heart's content, without diminishing the quantity, or injuring the quality, of the common stock; and Mr. Clark has kindly offered for the benefit of the public at large, a portion of the viands which have for so many years tickled the literary palates of the readers of the Knickerbocker:—Knick-Knacks from an Editor's Table, New York, 1853, 12mo.

Clark, Willis Gaylord, 1810-1841, a native of Otisco, New York, proprietor and editor of the venerable Philadelphia Gazette, gained great distinction in the walks of both poetry and prose. As specimens of the former, we need only select from the many pieces the "Song of May," "Memory," and "A Lament." His facility and excellence in prose composition will be seen by reference to Ollapodiana, (New York, 1844, 8vo.) a series of papers contributed to the New York Knickerbocker Magazine, of which his brother, LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK, was, and still is, editor. His Poems, also, have been pub. in a collective form. See Griswold's Poets and Poetry, also his Prose Writers of America; Duyckinck's Cyc. of Amer. Lit.

"These three numbers of Mr. Clark's writings contain a series of essays and sketches, under the rather fantastic title of 'Ollapodiana,' which were originally published in the Knickerbocker. They are written in a free and flowing style, merry and sad by turns, now in the sunshine and now in the shade, but always with an undercurrent of deep feeling, in which there are no impurities. Occasionally poems, sometimes original and at others selected, are introduced, showing the taste and graceful power of the author, and the habitual tendency of his mind toward the beautiful. Indeed, we think Mr. Clark a better poet than prose writer. The whole tone of his mind is highly poetical, and his thoughts continually flow into rhythm, if not into rhyme. . . . All Mr. Clark's friends (and few men have had more or warmer ones) will welcome this volume, as a mirror of his mind, of his quaintness, his humour, his pathos, his easy, careless manner, his disregard of conventionalities, and, above all, of his gentle, humane, and generous heart."—*N. Clarke, Adam, LL.D., 1767-1832, a native of Magherafelt, near Londonderry, Ireland, was recommended to the notice of the excellent John Wesley, and by his influence placed at the Kingswood School near Bristol. The purchase of a Hebrew Grammar led him to cultivate an acquaintance with Oriental literature, in which he attained considerable proficiency. When 19 he became an itinerant preacher, and was thus employed for 26 years. In 1805 he settled in London, where he assiduously devoted himself to a work which engaged his attention more or less for a large portion of his life—the Commentary on the Bible. In 1815 he retired to an estate at Millbrook, in Lancashire, purchased for him by some generous friends. In 1826 he visited the Shetland Isles, to ascertain the condition of the Methodist Mission, established by the conference, at his suggestion, in 1822. In 1823 he returned to London, but finding his health impaired, removed to the parish of Ruslip, in Middlesex, where he remained until his death in 1832. Dr. Clarke was eminent for industry, piety, and zeal. His Commentary on the Scriptures will carry his name to the remotest generation. Dissertation on the Use and Abuse of Tobacco, Lon., 1797, 8vo. of consulting 8 small volumes, are sufficient to repel aught save the most determined bibliographical zeal. In 1807 his Lectures on Mineralogy, delivered at Cambridge, excited much attention, and in the following year the University established a Professorship of this science in favour of Dr. Clarke. In 1790 he travelled with a pupil, a nephew of the Duke of Dorset, through parts of Great Britain and Ireland. He pub. an account of this tour in 1793, 8vo. Chemical Con. to Ann. Philos., 1816, '17. In 1798, in company with a pupil, Mr. Cripps, he made the extensive tour, the description of which has conferred so much just celebrity on Dr. Clarke's name. Their absence, which it was intended should not exceed six months, was prolonged to three years and a half. The travellers visited Denmark, Sweden, Lapland, Finland, Russia, Tartary, Circassia, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Greece; returning home from Constantinople, across the Balkan mountains, through Germany and France. The medals, minerals, plants, and MSS., collected during this tour, were sold to the Bodleian Library. Dr. Clarke's Travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, &c., were published: Vol. i., 1810; ii., 1812; iii., 1814; iv., 1816; v., 1819; vi., (posth.) 1823, 4to; also in 11 vols. 8vo, 1816-24. These charming and instructive volumes not only claim a place in the first rank of travels by Englishmen, but the first place in the first rank. We shall adduce some valuable testimonies to their merits:

"You have seen and described more of the East than any of your predecessors.—I need not say how ably and successfully. Will you accept my very sincere congratulations on your second volume, wherein I have retraced some of my old paths adorned by you so beautifully, that they afford me double delight? How much you have traversed! I must resume my seven-leagued boots and journey to Palestine, which your description mortifies me not to have seen more than ever. I still sigh for the Aegean. Shall you not always love its bluest of all waves and brightest of all skies? You have awakened all the gipsy in me. I long to be restless again, and wandering: see what mischief you do; you won't allow gentlemen to settle quietly at home. I will not wish you success and fame, for you have both; but all the happiness which even these cannot always give."—Letter from Lord Byron to Dr. Clarke.

"We willingly pass over a host of minor, and even respectable, travellers to journey in company with Dr. Clarke, whose strong powers of observation, and eloquent and animated pictures, both of art and nature, have raised him to so high a rank, among modern travellers. His profound skill in antiquities peculiarly qualified him for exploring the regions he principally traversed."—Murray's History of Discoveries.

"There is no department of inquiry or observation to which Dr. C. did not direct his attention during his travel: in all he gives much information in a pleasant style; and to all he evidently brought much judgment, talent, and preparatory knowledge."—Stevenson's Discovery, Navigation, and Commerce.

"The splendour and celebrity of all travels performed by Englishmen have been exceeded by those of the late and deeply lamented Dr. Edward Clarke. Few travellers have attained so large and so general a reputation. His style is easy and perspicuous: his facts are striking, interesting, and instructive: his matter, while it is highly to the best interests of science, displays the keen and penetrating observation, the hardy enterprise, and the invincible perseverance of the author. That Dr. Clarke will live, in the purest sense of the word, cannot be doubted for an instant: his name will be held in more than ordinary estimation by a grateful posterity. Upon the whole, if Humboldt be the first, Clarke is the second, traveller of his age."—Dr. Dibdin's Library Companion.

"Few travellers can be compared with Dr. Clarke, whether we consider the number of countries which he visited, the extent and variety of his researches, or the diligence and success with which he applied himself to collect materials, illustrations of natural philosophy, antiquities, and the fine arts."—Museum Criticum, Cambridge.

"He has a power of selecting objects, and raciness in describing them, almost unparalleled. Few men have seen so much as this lively and interesting traveller, and still fewer have so well described what they have seen."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"On all the topics which interest a traveller, Dr. Clarke's information is important and extensive; and we accordingly find in these volumes a vast body of matter exceedingly valuable for rectifying the errors of other writers, and for increasing our knowledge of countries aspiring to the first rank among European nations."—Edin. Review.

"No man has surveyed the world with the advantages of more various learning, or has communicated to the public the results of his remarks on mankind, in a style more distinguished for clearness, elegance, and facility, than the learned and intelligent author of these matchless volumes."—*Lon. "The accomplished and famed traveller of Cambridge. He is a most favourable specimen of English travellers, and does honour to the great University of which he was such a distinguished ornament."—Blackwood's Magazine.

Clarke, Mary Cowden, an English lady, for some years past resident at Nice, has distinguished herself for all future time by the successful execution of one of the happiest literary projects which ever entered into the imagination of man or woman. That laborious index-maker, Samuel Ayscough, had pub. in 1790 a Copious Index to the Remarkable Passages and Words made use of by Shakespeare; reprinted, Dublin, 1791, and Lon., 1827, 8vo. Francis Twiss also gave to the world in 1805-07, 2 vols. 8vo, a Complete Verbal Index to the Plays of Shakespeare. But these works, which had cost the authors such an outlay of time and toil, were very incomplete, and perhaps more frequently productive of headaches and new instances of the "pursuit of knowledge under difficulties," than successful explorations. Now, it occurred to Mrs. Clarke that a Complete Concordance to the Dramatic Works of Shakespeare would be invaluable to the literary world, and would enter into a companionship with the great bard as close and enduring as that which subsists between Coke and Littleton. Or if Mrs. Clarke did not exactly think all this, we may be allowed to think it for her. To this magnum opus, pub. in 1846, she devoted the untiring labour of sixteen years, twelve in the preparation of the MS. and four more in guiding it through the press. The length of time employed will not seem extravagant, when we consider that the 2578 columns which compose the work contain about 309,000 lines, each one of which required, both in MS. and print, a rigid scrutiny. How faithfully this duty was discharged, may be judged from the fact, that the table of errata contains but thirteen lines; all of which are omissions merely: as to errors, we have no evidence of their existence. The reader will feel a great curiosity to know the modus operandi adopted in such an Herculean undertaking:

"We had been erroneously informed that each line of the Concordance was written on a separate slip of paper, and put into baskets alphabetically arranged. Had this been so, we opine it would have required buck-baskets as large as that into which fat Jack was so unceremoniously thrust, and a room to hold them as capacious as St. George's Hall, in Windsor Castle. Far different and more ingenious was the mode pursued."—R. BALMUNO: see A Testimonial to Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke, New York, 1852, privately printed for subscribers only.

We trust that we shall not be blamed if we gratify a laudable curiosity, by an extract from a letter from Mrs. Clarke to the author of this Dictionary, in which the grand secret is disclosed:

"The method I pursued was this:—I had a wide-backed portfolio for each letter of the Alphabet. (In some instances—as S, for example—it required two portfolios.) I took a fresh sheet of paper for each word I inscribed. I worked straight through two pages of Shakespeare as they lay open before me, letter by letter, thus:—suppose the top line of the page was 'Angels are bright still, though the brightest fell.' I entered the word 'Angel' under its proper head, and all the succeeding words beginning with A through the two pages; then 'fell,' and so on, till the whole of the two pages were gone through; and then on to two more. At the end of each play, I collected all the filled pages of the MS., that my portfolio might be as little loaded as need be; but even with this precaution, the bulk in use was very large. However, although the bulk may be increased by using a fresh sheet for each word, yet I think the advantage of clearness thus obtained quite counterbalances the inconvenience, &c."—Dorchester Terrace, Baywater, March 26, 1852.

So admirably simple and ingenious was the path which led the adventurer safely through this wilderness of words. Every one who has a SHAKESPEARE—as "who hath not, that hath" a book at all—should immediately procure Mrs. Clarke's invaluable CONCORDANCE. Let the reader add to this volume Mrs. Clarke's Girlhood of Shakspeare's Heroines; Shakspeare Proverbs; Kit Bam's Adventures, and The Iron Cousin, or Mutual Influence.

"Mrs. Cowden Clarke, whose Concordance of Shakespeare shows such mastery of the letter of the poet's works, now evinces her appreciation of their spirit in a series of fictions entitled The Girlhood of Shakspeare's Heroines."—Dickens's Household Narratives.

Clarke, Samuel, D.D., 1675-1729, one of the most celebrated of English philosophers and divines, was a native of Norwich, where his father, Edward Clarke, was an alderman. He entered Caius College, Cambridge, in 1691; Chaplain to Dr. Moore, Bishop of Norwich, 1698, who gave him the rectory of Drayton; Rector of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf, London, 1706; Rector of St. James's, Westminster, 1709. When only twenty years of age he distinguished himself by a successful effort to substitute the Newtonian for the Cartesian philosophy, which still prevailed at Cambridge. The physics of Rohault, "a work entirely Cartesian," was the Cambridge text-book. The Latinity of this work was very defective, and this fact gave Clarke an opportunity to supplant its principles under the cloak of a better translation, and supplementary notes.

"A new and more elegant translation was published by Dr. [then Mr.] Samuel Clarke, with the addition of notes, in which that profound and ingenious writer explained the views of Newton on the principal subjects of discussion, so that the notes contained virtually a refutation of the text: they did so, however, only virtually; all appearance of argument and controversy being carefully avoided. Whether this escaped the notice of the learned doctors or not, is uncertain; but the new translation, from its better Latinity, . . . was readily admitted to all the academical honours which the old one had enjoyed. Thus the stratagem of Dr. Clarke completely succeeded; the tutor might prelect from the text, but the pupil would sometimes look into the notes; and error is never so sure of being exposed as when the truth is placed close to it, side by side, without any thing to alarm prejudice or awaken from its lethargy the dread of innovation."—PROF. PLAYFAIR.

"This certainly was a more prudent method of introducing truth unknown before, than to attempt to throw aside this treatise entirely and write a new one instead of it. The success answered exceedingly well to his hopes: and he may justly be styled a great benefactor to the university in this attempt. For by this means the true philosophy has, without any noise, prevailed; and to this the translation of Rohault is, generally speaking, the standing text for lectures, and his notes the first direction to those who are willing to receive the truth of things, in the place of invention and romance."—BISHOP HADLEY.

Of this translation there have been four editions; the last and best, in 1718, 8vo. A translation of Rohault into English, with Dr. Samuel Clarke's Notes, was made by the brother of the latter, Dr. John Clarke, Dean of Sarum, Lon., 1710, 2 vols. 8vo.

plied himself with much zeal to theological learning, in which he made great attainments. Three Practical Essays on Baptism, Confirmation, and Repentance, 1699, 8vo.

"Mr. Whiston esteems these Essays the most serious treatises Dr. Clarke ever wrote, and which, with a little correction, will still be very useful in all Christian families."—Blag. Brit.

But audet alteras pariter :

"These publications gave little promise of Clarke's subsequent performances. They are destitute of originality and acuteness; nor is there any thing in the style to compensate for mediocrity of thought and illustration."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist. of Eng.

"Dr. Clarke's Paraphrase deserves an attentive reading: he narrates a story in handsome language, and connects the parts well together; but fails much in emphasis, and seems to mistake the order of the histories."—Dr. DODDING.

"Dr. Clarke was a superior scholar, and a man who studied the Bible with attention, though some of its grand doctrines were not correctly understood by him. . . . Those who are partial to paraphrases of the Bible, which the author of this work is not, will find Clarke and Pyle not inferior to the generality of paraphrasts."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Pyle's [Thomas] Paraphrase on the Acts and the Epistles, 1725, 2 vols. 8vo, and on the Book of Revelation, 1735, 8vo, were designed as a continuation of Clarke's work. See PYLE, THOMAS. Controversy with Mr. Dodwell respecting the Immortality of the Soul; five treatises, pub. 1706, '07. Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God. The Obligations of Natural Religion, and the Truth and Certainty of the Christian Revelation, in Answer to Hobbes, Spinoza, &c., being the Substance of 16 Sermons preached 1704, '05, at the Lecture founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle, 1705 and 1706, 2 vols. 8vo. The first eight sermons are devoted to A Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God.

Very different opinions have been entertained of this celebrated demonstration. The satirical commentary of Pope has but little weight, for the theological opinions of the author of the Dunciad have never been considered especially valuable. Dr. Thomas Brown has a better claim to be heard, and he considers the speculations of Clarke and others of a like character, as "Relics of the mere verbal logic of the schools, as little capable of producing conviction as any of the wildest and most absurd of the technical scholastic reasonings on the properties, or supposed properties, of entity and non-entity."

Dugald Stewart acknowledges that "argument à priori has been enforced with singular ingenuity by Dr. Clarke," yet he confesses that it "does not carry complete conviction to my mind."

Bishop Hoadly, the stout apologist for Clarke, declares that his demonstration

"Is one regular building, erected upon an unmovable foundation, and rising up from one stage to another, with equal strength and dignity."

Whiston tells us that he was in his garden when Clarke brought him this famous volume:

"Now I perceived that in these Sermons he had dealt a great deal in abstract and metaphysical reasonings. I therefore asked him how he ventured into such subtilties, which I never durst meddle with? And shewing him a nettle, or the like contemptible weed, in my garden, I told him, that weed contained better arguments for the Being and Attributes of God, than all his metaphysics. He confessed it to be so; but alleged for himself, that, since such philosophers as Hobbes and Spinoza had made use of those kind of subtilties against him, he thought proper to shew, that the like way of reasoning might be better made use of on the side of religion. Which reason, or excuse, I allowed not to be inconsiderable."—Hist. Mem.: see Blag. Brit.

We think that Clarke's "reason or excuse" should have been most satisfactory.

A great philosopher remarks, with much modesty, of such "metaphysics," as Whiston styles them,

"These are the speculations of men of superior genius; but whether they be as solid as they are sublime, or whether they be the wanderings of imagination in a region beyond the limits of human understanding, I am unable to determine."—Dr. REM.

The topic was not a new one, nor the arguments adduced altogether original, even in the English school of philosophy. Ralph Cudworth, Henry More, and John Howe, (especially see The Living Temple), had all previously been "sailing on this sea of speculation."

The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, Lon., 1712, 8vo. This work led to a protracted controversy, in which Dr. Waterland, Mr. Nelson, Edwards, Wells, Gastrell, Whitby, Jackson, and others took part. For a list of the publications of Dr. Clarke and his opponents on this subject, see Watt's Bibl. Bib. and the Biog. Brit.; also Walchii Bibl. Theol. 964-6; and T. H. Horne's Cat., 2 Col. Library, Camb., vol. i.

"The sentiments of Clarke upon this point were undoubtedly Arian; but it was an Arianism which approached as closely as possible to the doctrine of the Trinity. He regarded the Son and Holy Spirit as emanations from the Father, endowed by him with every attribute of Deity, self-existence alone excepted."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist. of England.

—Jones and Waterland will furnish a sufficient reply to Clarke."—BICKERSTETH: Christian Student.

"The writings of Dr. Clarke on the Trinity contain a great deal of discussion respecting the meaning of Scripture, and occasioned a very extended controversy in England. He seems to have been led to the sentiments adopted and defended, by his metaphysical tone of mind, and by pursuing improperly the language of human creeds respecting the generation of the Son of God. The controversy tended greatly to spread Arianism over the country."—ORME: Bibl. Bib.

Clarke was now called upon to defend the Newtonian philosophy against Leibnitz, who had represented it to the Princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Consort of George II., as false in philosophy, and dangerous in theology. At the request of the princess, Sir Isaac Newton took up the mathematical line of defence, leaving the philosophical branch to Dr. Clarke. The latter pub. the Collection of Papers which passed between him and Leibnitz, relating to the Principles of Natural Philosophy and Religion, in 1717. Discourse on some O. T. Prophecies, 1725, 8vo. His discussion with Leibnitz respecting Philosophical Liberty and Necessity was succeeded on the death of Leibnitz by a similar controversy with Anthony Collins. Clarke pub. in 1717 his Remarks on Collins's Enquiry concerning Human Liberty. This work and his discussion with Leibnitz were pub. in French by Des Maizeaux in 1720. Seventeen Sermons, 1724. Trans. of the first Twelve Books of Homer's Iliad, 1729, 4to. Twelve last Books, (partly trans. by Dr. Samuel Clarke,) pub. by his son, Samuel Clarke, 1732, 4to. The Latin version is almost entirely new, and annotations are added at the bottom of the pages.

"The translation, with his corrections, may now be styled accurate; and his notes, as far as they go, are indeed a treasury of grammatical and critical knowledge."—BISHOP HOADLY.

Exposition of the Church Catechism, Lon., 1729, 8vo; 1730, 8vo, and in his Works, vol. iii. This Exposition occasioned a controversy, in which Drs. Waterland and Sykes and Thos. Emlyn were concerned. Sermons from the author's MSS., by Jno. Clarke, D.D., Dean of Sarum, 1739, '31, 10 vols. 8vo. Eighteen Sermons, 1734, 8vo. Works, with his Life, by Bishop Hoadly, 1738, 4 vols. fol. Homeri Odyssea; Græce et Latine, 4th ed., Glasg., 1799, 2 vols. Letter to Dr. Hoadly. Mathematical Con. to Phil. Trans., 1728.

"Dr. Clarke was as bright a light and masterly a teacher of truth and virtue as ever yet appeared among us. . . . His sentiments and expressions were so masterly, his way of explaining the phraseology of Scripture by collecting and comparing together the parallel places, so extraordinary and convincing, as to make his method of preaching so universally acceptable, that there was not a parishioner who was not always pleased at his coming into their Pulpit, or who was ever weary of his instruction. His works must last as long as any language remains to convey them to future times."—BISHOP HOADLY.

"He rarely reaches the sublime, or aims at the pathetic; but in a clear, manly, flowing style, he delivers the most important doctrines, confirmed on every occasion by well-applied passages from Scripture. He was not perfectly orthodox in his opinions; a circumstance which has lowered his character among many."—Dr. Knox.

"Eminently and justly celebrated."—Dr. PARR.

"If a preacher's disposition incline him to the illustration of the sacred text, which, in strict truth, is performing what by his office he has engaged himself to undertake, that is to say, to preach the word of God, the best models I can think of are the Sermons of Dr. Samuel Clarke of St. James's, who is always plain, clear, accurate, and full."—BISHOP WATERBURY.

"I should recommend Dr. Clarke's Sermons, were he orthodox; however, it is very well known where he was not orthodox, which was upon the doctrine of the Trinity, as to which he is a condemned heretic; so one is aware of it."—Dr. JOHNSON.

We quote from a very eminent authority the following admirable sketch of Dr. Clarke considered as a philosopher:

"The chief glory of Clarke, as a metaphysical author, is due to the boldness and ability with which he placed himself in the breach against the Necessitarians and Fatalists of his times. With a mind far inferior to that of Locke, in comprehensiveness, in originality, and in fertility of invention, he was nevertheless the more wary and skilful disputant of the two; possessing, in a singular degree, that reach of thought in grasping remote consequences, which effectually saved him from those rash concessions into which Locke was frequently betrayed by the greater warmth of his temperament and vivacity of his fancy. This logical foresight (the natural result of his habits of mathematical study) rendered him peculiarly fit to contend with adversaries eager and qualified to take advantage of every vulnerable point in his doctrine; but it gave, at the same time, to his style a tameness and monotony, and want of colouring, which never appear in the easy and spirited, though often unfinished and unequal sketches of Locke. Voltaire has somewhere said of him, that he was a mere reasoning machine, (un moulin à raisonnement), and the expression (though doubtless much too unqualified) possesses merit, in point of just discrimination, of which Voltaire was probably not fully aware."—DUGALD STEWART: *1st Frelim. Clarke, Samuel, D.D., grandson of the preceding, pastor to a congregation of Dissenters at St. Alban's. Christian's Inheritance, being a Collection of the Promises of Scripture under their Proper Heads, &c., Lon., 1790, 12mo; new edit., with an Essay, by Ralph Wardlaw, D.D., 12mo, Lon., 1850.

"In this edition every passage of Scripture has been compared and verified. The volume is like an arranged museum of gems, and precious stones, and pearls of inestimable value. The divine promises comprehend a rich and endless variety."—DR. WARDLAW.

"The promises (Clarke's Collection) are for the most part well arranged, and this book has been found food for many. But it has one serious fault: they are Scripture promises, but not in the Scripture mode and connection. They are often discovered from the Christian tempers and duties with which they are associated in the Scripture, and in which alone an interest in them is maintained and enjoyed."—BICKERSTETH: Christian Student.

Petition to the Lord Protector for the Scots Rebel; a satirical Poem. Works, 1687, 8vo. See notice of edita. in Lowndes's Bibl. Manual, Bibl. Anglo-Poet., and Retrospect. Review, xii. 123. Cleaveland's poetry was greatly admired by his contemporaries: the nephew of Milton remarks, perhaps with some little asperity,

"In fine, so great a man Cleaveland has been in the estimation of the generality. In regard his conceits were out of the common road, and wittily far-fetched, that grave men, in outward appearance, have not spared, in my hearing, to affirm him the best of English Poets; and let them think so still, whoever pleased, provided it be made no article of faith."—Edward Phillips.

It is easy to see who did not think so: whether Phillips had any family pride to prejudice him, we shall not decide.

"While the first edition and sheets of Paradise Lost were slowly struggling through the mists of bigotry and party prejudice into public reputation, the poems of Cleaveland were poured forth in innumerable impressions. The reverse is now the singular contrast; and Cleaveland has had the fate of those poets, described in Johnson's Life of Cowley, who, 'paying their court to temporary prejudices, have been at one time too much praised, and at another too much neglected.'"—Retrospect. Review, xii. 123; read this article.

"A general artist, pure Latinist, exquisite orator, and (which was his master-piece) eminent poet. His epithets were pregnant with metaphors, carrying in them a difficult plainness; difficult at hearing, plain at the consideration thereof. Lord Rodney first adopted and followed the mode of attack recommended by Mr. Clerk; and the success which attended this new mode has since recommended it to our most celebrated admirals."—Edin. Review.

But General Sir Howard Douglas professes to prove that Lord Rodney could not possibly have been informed of Mr. Clerk's theory at the time of the battle, (against the French under De Graasse in the West Indies;) and it has been asserted that Clerk's Essay is principally taken from P. Paul Hoste's L'Art des Armes Navales. William Clerk is thus honourably mentioned by Sir Walter Scott:

"William Clerk is the second son of the celebrated author of Naval Tactics. I have known him intimately since our college days; and to my thinking, never met a man of greater powers or more complete information on all desirable subjects."—Scott's Journal, Nov. 20, 1825.

Cleveland, Aaron, (son of Rev. Aaron C. and Susannah Porter, d. of Rev. Dr. Porter of Malden, Mass.) b. in Haddam, Conn., 1744, d. at New Haven, 1815. The Philosopher and Boy; a Poem, written before he was twenty-one; Family Blood, a burlesque poem; Slavery Considered, an anti-slavery Poem, in blank verse, of about 800 lines, published in 1775; and two Peace-Sermons, 1815, entitled The Life of Man Inviolable, which were republished in England. For a Memoir of him, and extracts from his poems, see Poets of Connecticut. We understand that his grandson, Prof. C. D. Cleveland, of Philadelphia, is about to publish his works with a life.

Cleveland, Charles Dexter, son of Rev. Charles Cleveland of Boston, was born at Salem, Mass., December 3, 1802. After spending five years in mercantile pursuits, in 1823 he entered Dartmouth College, and graduated in 1827. In 1830 he was elected Professor of the Latin and Greek languages in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn.; and in 1832 Professor of the Latin Language and Literature in the University of the City of New York. In 1834 he established a Young Ladies' School in Philadelphia, of which he still (1858) continues the Principal.

The following is a list of the works pub. by Prof. C. In 1826, while a Junior in College, The Moral Characters of Theophrastus, with a Translation and Critical Notes: in 1827, while a Senior, An Epitome of Grecian Antiquities: in 1828, First Lessons in Latin upon a New Plan, and in the same year, The National Orator: in 1830, Xenophon's Anabasis, with English Notes: in 1831, a Compendium of Grecian Antiquities, being the Epitome rewritten and greatly enlarged, with Maps and Illustrations: in 1832, First Lessons in Greek: in 1834, a Sequel to First Lessons in Latin: in 1836, an edition of Adams's Latin Grammar, with numerous Additions and Improvements: in 1844, an Address of the Liberty Party of Pennsylvania to the People of the State: in 1845, First Latin Book, and in the same year, Second Latin Book: in 1846, Third Latin Book: in 1848, A Compendium of English Literature, from Sir John Mandeville to William Cowper: in 1850, Hymns for Schools; with appropriate Selections from the Scriptures: in 1851, English Literature of the Nineteenth Century: in 1853, an edition of Milton's Poetical Works, with Life, Dissertations on each Poem, Notes, an Index to Subjects of Paradise Lost, and a Verbal Index to all the Poems: in 1858, A Compendium of American Literature, on the plan of the Compendium of English Literature.

"The books of Professor Cleveland's Latin Series are well calculated for leading the learner forward, step by step, in acquiring a knowledge of that language which enters so largely into all our scientific works."—Hunt's Merchant's Magazine.

Professor Cleveland's edition of Milton we consider the most correct, compact, and convenient edition published in this country. It is "critical enough for the scholar, full enough for the general reader, beautiful enough for the table of the opulent, but, above all, cheap enough for the school-room and for the dwellings of those whose limited means prevent them from buying expensive books."

"An edition which must have cost immense labour, from the care and accuracy with which every word has been weighed."—National Magazine.

"A preeminently appreciable pleasure it is to find a new and carefully-prepared edition of a favourite writer."—Knickerbocker.

"The Index of Subjects is full and judicious; the Verbal Index remarkably accurate; and the Notes signally pertinent."—Bibliotheca Sacra.

"The Text I have found in all cases the best; the Notes most judiciously selected or supplied; while the Index is complete and faultless as far as human labour can be."—Jos. G. Osgood, Librarian of the Astor Library.

Professor Cleveland's Compendium of English Literature and his English Literature of the 19th Century are most valuable manuals, and should be in every college, school, family, and library, and on every parlour-table where literature is not entirely repudiated.

Notices of the Compendium of English Literature.

"Having, some years since, meditated a similar undertaking, I can appreciate, in a measure, the difficulties with which you were called to contend, and the skill with which you have surmounted them."—RT. REV. A. POTTER, D.D., LL.D.

"To form such a Compendium, good taste, fine scholarship, familiar acquaintance with English literature, unwearied industry, tact acquired by practice, an interest in the culture of the young, a regard for truth, purity, philanthropy, religion, as the highest attainment and the highest beauty,—all these were needed; and they are united in Mr. Cleveland."—Boston Christian Register.

"Of the filial attachment of Americans to the literature of Old England the work before us is a most creditable specimen. It is decidedly the best book of the kind we know. Though it is not bulky, it comprises an immense amount of valuable matter."—London Athenæum, March, 1851.

Clifford, Anne, Countess of Dorset and Pembroke, 1589–1676, daughter of the famous Earl of Cumberland, and author of the most celebrated letter by a female in the English language, is commended by Mr. Pennant as the most eminent person of her age for intellectual accomplishments, for spirit, magnificence, and deeds of benevolence. She erected a monument to Daniel the historian, another to Spenser, founded two hospitals, and repaired or built seven churches and six castles.

"She knew well how to discourse of all things, from predestination to ale-drink."—DR. DOWNE.

The countess settled the matter on this wise:

"I have been bullied by an usurper, I have been neglected by a court; but I will not be dictated to by a subject: your man

Cobbett, William, 1762-1835, a voluminous political writer, was the son of a farmer and publican at Farnham, in Surrey. He ran away from his father, enlisted as a soldier, and served for some time in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Returning to England, he received his discharge, and in 1792 visited France, from whence he sailed for America, arriving in New York in October of the same year. In 1796 he settled in Philadelphia, and, establishing Peter Porcupine's Gazette, took a lively interest in the political questions of the day. His intemperance in controversy provoked suits for slander by Dr. Rush and others, and the satirist was fined the sum of $5000. The works of Peter Porcupine, 1783-1801, in 12 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1801, should be carefully perused by the student of American history.

"Cobbett, in these volumes, has left a picture of the politics and leading politicians of America, which (with caution) must be studied by all who would understand the party questions with which they were discussed."—KRRR.

In 1800 he sailed for England, where he started The Porcupine, an advocate of Mr. Pitt. He subsequently established The Weekly Register, in which he communicated with the public for thirty years. In 1817 he again visited America, in consequence of the Six Acts. These were repealed in 1819, and the exile returned, carrying with him the bones of the notorious Tom Paine, for which riddance America owes Cobbett's memory no little respect. In 1832 the noisy gentleman was returned to Parliament, where, by a wonderful metamorphosis, like Bottom in the Play, he "roared as gently as any sucking dove." He died at his farm in Surrey, June 18, 1835. His Political Works, being an Abridgment of 100 vols. which compose the writings of Peter Porcupine, and The Weekly Political Register, with Notes by his Sons, were pub. in 1842, Lon., 6 vols. 8vo; to 1848, 9 vols. He also wrote the Emigrant's Guide; Poor Man's Friend; Cottage Economy; Village Sermons; An English Grammar; A Grammar to teach Frenchmen the English Language; Trans. of Marten's Law of Nations; A Year's Residence in America; Parliamentary History of England to 1803, 12 vols., and Debates, 1803-10, 16 vols. royal 8vo; and some other works. See a list of his pamphlets, &c., in Watt's Bibl. Brit.; a memoir in Gent. Mag., Aug. 1835, and a notice in the Lon. Times, same year. See Donaldson's Agricult. Biog. for a notice of Cobbett's works on Agriculture and Horticulture: Cottage Economy, Lon., 1822, 8vo. An edit. of Tull's Horse-hoeing Husbandry, 1822. Rural Rides, &c.; The Woodlands, or a Treatise on Planting, 1825, 8vo. Treatise on Cobbett's Corn, 1828, 8vo.

"This author did not in any way advance the practice of agriculture, either by precept or example; but he adorned the parts that have been mentioned, by his homely knowledge of the art, and most agreeable delineation. He did not grasp the art as a comprehensive whole, nor did he aspire to the higher branches, among which to indulge a lofty seat of view and ideal elevation."—Donaldson's Agricult. Biog.

Cockburn, Mrs. Catherine, 1679-1749, was a native of London, a daughter of Captain David Trotter, R. N. In her 17th year her tragedy of Agnes de Castro was produced with great success at the Theatre Royal. In 1698 she gave to the world the Tragedy of Fatal Friendship, and in 1701, The Unhappy Penitent. In the same year she contributed, with several other ladies, to the Nine Muses; a tribute to the memory of John Dryden. In 1706 her tragedy entitled The Revolution of Sweden was acted at the Queen's Theatre. In 1708 she was married to the Rev. Mr. Cockburn, who was subsequently presented to the living of Long-Horsley, Northumberland. In the previous year she returned to the communion of the Church of England, which she had when quite young forsaken for the Church of Rome. In 1726 she pub. a Letter to Dr. Holdsworth in vindication of Mr. Locke's Essay respecting the resurrection of the body. In 1747 appeared her Remarks upon the Principles and Reasonings of Dr. Rutherford's Essay on the Nature and Obligations of Virtue.

"It [Mrs. Cockburn's refutation] contains all the clearness of expression, the strength of reason, the precision of logic, and attachment to truth, which makes books of this nature really useful to the common cause of virtue and religion."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

In 1751 Dr. Birch pub. an edition of Mrs. Cockburn's Works in 2 vols. 8vo. This collection, however, contains none of her dramatic pieces excepting The Fatal Friendship. Of her poetical essays, The Flowers of the Forest is best known to the public, and has even been placed in competition with Miss Jane Elliott's beautiful ballad of the same title. The following is so conclusive an evidence of the good taste of Sir Aston, that we quote it to his credit, and for the benefit of our readers. After reviewing the claims of the various attractions which the world offers to its votaries, he thus announces his own preference:

"Give me a study of good books, and I Envy to none their hagg'd felicity."

Coke, Sir Edward, 1551-52-1632, a native of Mileham, Norfolk, was entered of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1567; became a member of the Inner Temple in 1572; and was called to the Bar in 1578. In 1593 he was elected a Member of Parliament for Norfolk, and was chosen Speaker of the House of Commons. In 1594 he was appointed Attorney-General, notwithstanding the strenuous effort of the Earl of Essex to secure the vacant post for Francis Bacon. Hence arose the enmity which existed between Coke and Bacon. In 1598 he was left a widower, and in the same year married the widow of Sir William Hattton, a grand-daughter of Lord High Treasurer Burleigh. Upon the accession of James I., Coke received the honour of knighthood. In 1603 he conducted the proceedings against Sir Walter Raleigh, and incurred merited censure for his professional insolence. In 1606 he was promoted to the Chief Justiceship of the Common Pleas, and in 1613 to the Chief Justiceship of the King's Bench. His resistance to the arbitrary and illegal acts of the king brought down upon him the royal displeasure, and in 1622 he was committed to the Tower, and there imprisoned for more than seven months. In 1625 he was returned to Parliament for Norfolk, and in 1629 represented the county of Buckingham. Though now in his 79th year, an attack upon the constitutional rights of Englishmen proved that his eagle eye, jealous in the cause of liberty, was not too dim to decipher the imperishable lines of Magna Charta, and that his "natural strength was not abated" in the championship of political freedom. At the close of this session he retired to his estate at Stoke Pogis, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits until the coming of that "night when no man can work." Repeating with his last breath the solemn invocation—"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done," he resigned his soul to his Maker on the 3d of September, 1632, and was buried at Titchshall Church in Norfolk. His principal works are Reports from 1600 to 1615.

1. A Book of Entries, 1611, fol. 2. Complete Copyholder, 1630, 4to. 3. A Treatise of Bail and Mainprise, 1637, 4to. 4. Reading on the Statute of Fines, 27 Edw. I., 1602, 4to. The work by which as a writer he is principally known to the present generation, and will be famous for all future ages, is Institutes of the Laws of England, in four parts, the first of which contains the Commentary on Littleton's Tenures, (1628,) the second, a Commentary on Magna Charta and other statutes, (1642,) the third, the Criminal Laws, or Pleas of the Crown, (1664,) and the fourth, an Account of the Jurisdiction of all the Courts in the Kingdom, (about 1644.) The first part of the Institutes, or Coke upon Littleton, has been styled "The Bible of the Law." We can hardly do justice to our subject without noticing this celebrated Commentary somewhat at length. The edits. from the 1st to the 14th were pub. in folio; those pub. subsequently are in octavo. Edit. 1st, 1628, is very incorrect; 2d, 1629, had the advantage of the author's revision; 14th edit., with Notes, References, &c. by F. HARGRAVE and C. BUTLER, (g. v.) 1789; to folio 195 by Hargrave, and from 196 to the end by Butler; 17th edit., with addit. notes by Charles Butler, 2 vols. 8vo; 18th ed., 1823, 2 vols. 8vo, and 1832, 2 vols. 8vo, are reprints of the 17th edit., with some addits. from Butler and Hargrave's Notes. (See article Coke in Marvin's Legal Bibl.) Thomas's Arrangement can hardly be called an edit. of Coke. American edits., Phila., by Thomas Day, 1812, 3 vols. 8vo; this is a reprint, with some addits. by the American editor, of the 15th London edit. Phila., beautifully printed by R. H. Small, from the 19th London edit., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo. We trust that the publication of this very cheap and excellent edit. will have a tendency to increase the study of Coke upon Littleton by our young lawyers. Although belonging to the lay class, we feel a deep interest that those who are intrusted to so large an extent with the conservation of the interests of society should become deeply imbued with the wisdom and the courage of those mighty men of old, who in the advocacy of what they knew to be right, treated with equal contempt the wrath of the king and the rage of the populace. When the judges were questioned, whether if the king should desire them to stay proceedings in any case before them, until he had consulted with them, they would consent to such interference, all answered in the affirmative, until it came to the turn of the stout Lord Chief Justice Coke, who courageously responded that,

"When that case should be, he would do that should be fit for a judge to do."

Did any freeman ever make a bolder answer, and did any lawyer ever make a wiser one? We shall quote a few from the many testimonies we might adduce to the value of the professional labours of this great ornament of the Bench and the Bar:

"His most learned and laborious works on the law will last to be admired by judicious posterity whilst Fame hath a trumpet left her, and any breath to blow therein. His judgment lately passed for an oracle in law; and if, since, the credit thereof hath carelessly been questioned, the wonder is not great. If the prophet himself, living in an incredulous age, found cause to complain, 'Who hath believed our report?' it need not seem strange that our illustrious times have afforded some to shake the authenticity of the 'reports' of any earthly judge."—Fuller's Worthies of Norfolk.

Lord Bacon, whilst praising Coke's large and fruitful mind, complains (though not with reference to his Commentary) of his habit of straying from his text:

"When you wander, as you often delight to do, you wander indeed, and give never such satisfaction as the curious time requires. This is not caused by any natural defect, but first for want of election, when you have a large and fruitful mind, which should not so much labour what to speak, as to find what to leave unspeaken."—LORD BACON: Letter to Coke.

This desultory habit is very perceptible in the commentary upon Littleton:

"The Institutes of Sir Edward Coke are unfortunately as deficient in method as they are rich in matter; at least the two first parts of them; wherein, acting only the part of a commentator, he hath thrown together an infinite treasure of learning in a loose, desultory order."—SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE.

This want of method induced Mr. J. H. Thomas to prepare a Systematic Arrangement of the Commentary, on the Plan of Sir Matthew Hale's Analysis, Lon., 1818, 3 vols. 8vo. American edit., Phila., 1836, 3 vols. 8vo. We cannot recommend this Arrangement in place of the original to the legal student. We agree with Judge Sharwood:

"It may be that the original wants method;—but the life and spirit of it are lost when it is hacked to pieces to be refitted together upon a new and different skeleton."

For notices of Coke's Reports, &c., we refer the reader to the works mentioned below.

A knowledge of ancient legal learning is absolutely necessary to a modern lawyer. Sir Edward Coke's Commentary upon Littleton is an immense repository of every thing that is most necessary or useful in the legal learning of ancient times. Were it not for his writings, we should still have to search for it in the voluminous and chaotic compilations of cases contained in the Year Books, or in the dry, though valuable abridgments of Statham, Fitzherbert, Brooke, and Rolle. Every person who has attempted it must be sensible how very difficult and disgusting it is to pursue a regular investigation of any point of law through these works. The writings of Coke have considerably abridged, if not entirely taken away, the necessity of this labour."—CHARLES BUTLER.

Mr. Butler, who declares that he is the best lawyer who best understands Coke upon Littleton, did much to increase the general usefulness of Coke:

"One cannot help observing how much the annotations of Mr. Butler excel those of his predecessor, Mr. Hargrave, both in succinctness of order, comprehensiveness of style, and elegance of diction."—HAWKESHEAD.

But Mr. Martin dissents from this judgment:

"Butler's notes, though deservedly esteemed, were confessedly too hastily prepared to reach the high standard of his predecessor. His knowledge appears to have been more various than profound." See Mart. Conv.; Bart. Com.; and Ritso's Introduction.

"Sir Edward Coke—that great oracle of our law."—EDMUND BURKE: Reflections on the Revolution in France.

"To Coke's opinion I must attribute more than to any single opinion of any judge. No one man hath deserved so well of the professors of the law; no one man in any human profession hath written so much and with so few errors as he."—SIR ORLANDO BRIDGMAN.

We may properly conclude this article with the opinions of some eminent American Jurists:

"The Commentary ought to be studied and mastered by every lawyer who means to be well acquainted with the reasons and grounds of the law, and to adorn the noble science he professes."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"His favourite law-book was the Coke upon Littleton, which he had read many times. Its principal texts he had treasured up in his memory, and his arguments at the bar abounded with perpetual recurrences to the principles and analogies drawn from this rich mine of common law learning."—Wharton's Life of Pinkney.

"Let not the American student of law suppose that the same necessity does not here exist, as in England, to make this 'golden book' his principal guide in the real law. All precedent in this country contradicts such an idea. The present generation of distinguished lawyers, as well as that which has just passed away, have given ample proofs of their familiarity with the writings of Lord Coke; and our numerous volumes of reports daily illustrate, that, with trivial exceptions, what is the law of real property at Westminster Hall is equally so in the various tribunals throughout our extensive country."—Hoffman's Legal Study.

"The work is one which cannot be too highly prized or too earnestly recommended to the diligent study of all who wish to be well grounded in legal principles. For myself, I agree with Mr. Butler in the opinion that he is the best lawyer who best understands Coke upon Littleton."—JUDOK SHARSWOOD.

Cole, William, 1714-1782, an eminent antiquary and a divine, a native of Cambridgeshire, was educated at Clare Hall and King's College, Cambridge; F.S.A., 1747; Rector of Hornsey, 1749; of Bletchley, 1767; Vicar of Burnham, 1774. In 1765 he accompanied his friend Horace Walpole to France, and had some thoughts of a permanent residence there; probably in consequence of his partiality for the Roman Catholic religion. He was an industrious antiquary, and contributed to Grose's Antiquaries; Bentham's Ely; Ducarel's publications; Phillip's Life of Cardinal Pole; Gough's British Topography; Memoirs of the Gentlemen's Society at Spalding; Nichols's Collection of Poems; Anecdotes of Hogarth; History of Hinkley; Life of Bowyer, &c. He was a zealous collector of portraits, and the letters between Horace Walpole and himself are sufficiently amusing, especially that relating to the "Algerine Hog," who carried off "187 of my most valuable and favourite heads." The following extracts from two of the letters of these friends will not be unacceptable to the reader:

"My poor dear Madame du Deffand's little dog is arrived. She made me promise to take care of it, the last time I saw her, should

I survive her. That I will, most religiously, and make it as happy as it is possible."—Horace Walpole to Cole, May 4, 1781.

"I congratulate the little Parisian dog that he has fallen into the hands of so humane a master. I have a little diminutive dog, Busy, full as great a favourite, and never out of my lap. I have already, in case of an accident, ensured it a refuge from starvation and ill usage. It is the least we can do for poor harmless, shiftless, pampered animals, that have amused us, and we have spoilt."—Oble to Walpole, May 7, 1781.

"How could he ever have got through the transcript of a Bishop's Register or a Chancery, with Busy on his lap?" See Nichols's Literary Anecdotes.

Cole made large MS. Collections for the compilation of an Athenae Cantabrigienses. We have already strenuously insisted upon the preparation of a work of this kind, (see BAKER, THOMAS, &c.,) and never intend to be satisfied until such an one we have! Cole also collected towards a county history of Cambridge, and seems to have commenced both this and the preceding compilation as early as 1724. His "purposes were not broken off in the midst," but like THOMAS BAKER's (q. v.) delayed until death would wait no longer. He left 100 small folio volumes of MSS., more than 50 of which relate to his projected Athenae. In a fit of despondency respecting the completion of his labours, he thus laments:

"In good truth, whoever undertakes this drudgery of an Athenae Cantabrigienses must be contented with no prospect of credit and reputation to himself, and with the mortifying reflection that after all his pains and study, through life, he must be looked upon in an humble light, and only as a journeyman to Anthony Wood, whose excellent book of the same sort will ever exclude any other, who shall follow him in the same track, from all hopes of fame; and will only represent him as an imitator of so original a pattern. For at this time of day, all great characters, both Cantabrigians and Oxonians, are already published to the world, either in his book, or various others; so that the collection, unless the same characters are reprinted here, must be made up of second-rate persons, and the refuse of authorship. However, as I have begun, and made so large a progress in this undertaking, it is death to think of leaving it off,—though, from the former considerations, so little credit is to be expected from it."—Quoted by Diaristi from a fly-leaf of 1777. See Miscellanies of Literature.

Now, no one could better confute this sophistry than Cole could, and did himself by his protracted labours. When will some Cambridge man, endued with the spirit of John Caius,—vide De Antiquitate Cantabrigienses Academicæ,—arise to take away the reproach from his alma mater?

Coleridge, Hartley, 1796-1849, eldest son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford. He lived a secluded life at Gramere, and on the banks of Rydal Water, contributing to Blackwood's Magazine, and occupied with other literary pursuits. He was a poet of no ordinary excellence, and his sonnets are among the best in modern literature. We may instance The First Sound to the Human Ear, and Prayer. Mr. Coleridge pub. Biographia Borealis; or, Lives of Distinguished Northmen, 1833, 4to. Poems: vol. i., Leeds, 1833, 8vo. The Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire, 1836, 8vo; new ed., by Derwent Coleridge, Lon., 1852, 3 vols. 12mo.

"This collection of Lives is, in our judgment, a work of such unusual merit, that it seems equally an act of justice to the author, and a service to sound literature, to rescue it from the mass of county histories and provincial biographies, with which, in consequence of its title, it runs the risk of being confounded."

Coleridge, Henry Nelson, d. 1843, nephew of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, was educated at Kton and at King's College, Cambridge, where he became Fellow. He accompanied WILLIAM HART COLERIDGE, Bishop of Barbadoes, (q. v.) on his outward voyage. We have the impressions he derived, in his work entitled, Six Months in the West Indies in 1825; anon.: 3d ed., with the author's name, 1832; now one of the series of Murray's Family Library. He was called to the bar by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple in 1826. Mr. Coleridge married his cousin SARA HENRY, daughter of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. (She is noticed on p. 406.) As editor of many of his uncle's writings, the public are under great obligations to Mr. Coleridge. He edited his Literary Remains, Lon., 1836-39, 4 vols. 8vo; The Friend, 1844, 3 vols. 8vo; Constitution of Church and State, 1839, 8vo; Biographia Literaria; 2d ed., edited partly by H. N. C., and completed by his widow, 1847, 2 vols. in 3, 8vo; Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, 1849, 8vo. Mr. Coleridge contributed to the Quarterly Review, and was author of an excellent Introduction to the Study of the Greek Classic Poets; 1st ed., 1830; 3d ed., Lon., 1846, 8vo.

"Written in that fresh and ardent spirit, which to the congenial mind of youth, will convey instruction in the most effective manner, by awakening the desire of it, and by enlivening the lively and buoyant feelings in the cause of useful and improving study; while by its pregnant brevity, it is more likely to stimulate than to supersede more profound and extensive research. Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, son of the preceding, 1772-1834, one of the most distinguished literary characters of modern days, was a native of the market-town of Ottery St. Mary, in Devonshire. He received his early education at Christ's Hospital, where he became senior-Gracian, or head scholar, and obtained an exhibition to Jesus College, Cambridge, where he remained from 1791 to 1793. Finding himself in London without resources or prospects, he enlisted in the 15th Elliot's Light Dragoons. That he was not happy in this situation, may be inferred from a Latin sentence which he one day wrote on the stable-wall under his saddle:

"Eheu! quam infortuni miserrimum est fuisse follicem!"

This scrap of learning elicited an inquiry on the part of his captain, which led to the restoration of the young scholar to his friends. In 1794 he published The Fall of Robespierre, a Hist. Drama, and a volume of Poems; and in the next year two political pamphlets—Conciones ad Populum, or Addresses to the People, and a Protest against certain Bills then pending for Suppressing Seditious Meetings. At that time he was a zealous Democrat and a Unitarian, with which sentiments his later tenets presented a remarkable contrast. Hunger, however, is stronger than speculation, and as a means of livelihood, our young enthusiast—who, with Southey, Wordsworth, and Lovell, had contemplated the establishment of a Pantisocracy on the banks of the Susquehanna—consented to write politics for the Morning Post, a supporter of Government. The three friends, instead of emigrating, married three sisters, Misses Fricker of Bristol. In 1798, by the liberality of Josiah and Thomas Wedgewood, he was enabled to spend some time in Germany, where he pursued his studies with great diligence. In 1812 he pub. a series of Essays entitled The Friend, which extended to twenty-seven numbers; in the year following appeared Remorse, a Tragedy; and in 1816, by the persuasion of Lord Byron, Christabel was given to the world. This poem, with the Rime of the Ancient Mariner and Genevieve, attained a popularity which has been perpetuated to the present day. To these poetical pieces must be added Zapoyla, a Drama, founded on The Winter's Tale, pub. in 1818, and some minor poems. A complete edition of his Poems in 3 vols. was issued by Pickering, not long before the author's death. Of his prose works may be mentioned The Statesman's Manual, or the Bible the Best Guide to Political Skill and Foresight; a Lay Sermon, 1816; a second Lay Sermon, 1817; Biographia Literaria, 1817, 2 vols.; Aids to Reflection, 1825; On the Constitution of Church and State, 1830; Lectures on Shakspeare; Table Talk; Theory of Life. He planned several great works which were never committed to paper. Indeed, an excessive use of opium, added to a native want of energy, produced an indolent habit, and lack of application, which were fatal to the prosecution of any extensive project. After a wandering life, residing in the houses of friends, alternately lecturing and contributing to periodicals, he settled in 1816 with Mr. Gilman, a physician at Highgate, and remained in his family until his death in 1834. A month or two before his decease he composed his own epitaph:

"Stop, Christian passer-by! Stop, Child of God!
And read with gentle breast. Beneath this sod
A poet lies, or that which once seemed he;
O lift a thought in prayer for S. T. C.
That he who many a year with toil of breath
Found death in life, may here find life in death!
Mercy, for praise—to be forgiven, for Fame—
He asked, and hoped through Christ. Do thou the same."

His Poetical and Dramatic Works were pub. in 1847, 3 vols. 8vo. The Friend, edited by H. N. Coleridge, 1844, 3 vols. 8vo. Essays on his own Times; 2d series of The Friend; edited by his daughter, 1850, 3 vols. 8vo. Aids to Reflection; 5th ed., enlarged, 1843, 2 vols. 8vo. Constitution of Church and State; edited by H. N. Coleridge, 1839, 8vo. Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, &c., edited by H. N. Coleridge, 1849, 8vo. Literary Remains, collected and edited by H. N. Coleridge, 1836-39, 4 vols. 8vo. Biographia Literaria, partly edited by H. N., and partly by Mrs. H. N. Coleridge, 1838, 2 vols. 8vo; 5th and concluding vol., by Derwent Coleridge, 1853, who also contemplates issuing a Life of his father, and a collected edition of his works. To his works should be added The Ideal of Life, edited by Dr. Watson, his Life by James Gillman, Lon., 1838, 1 vol. 8vo, and Joseph Cottle's Reminiscences of Coleridge and Southey, Lon., 1847, 8vo. As a conversationalist, Coleridge enjoyed a remarkable reputation. He loved to keep the field entirely to himself; and hour after hour—if the auditors could spare the time—would he pour forth "things new and old," illustrated by a "boundless range of scientific knowledge, brilliancy and exquisite nicety of illustration, deep and ready reasoning, immensity of bookish lore, dramatic story, joke, and pun."

His friend Charles Lamb gave a significant hint to Coleridge of his propensity to monopolize, in answering the query of the latter—"Charles, did you ever hear me preach?" (When young, he sometimes filled the Unitarian pulpit at Taunton.) "I never heard you do any thing else," replied Lamb. Dr. Dibdin gives us a graphic sketch of the impression produced upon him by Coleridge's conversation:

"I shall never forget the effect his first conversation made upon me at the first meeting. It struck me as something not only out of the ordinary course of things, but as an intellectual exhibition altogether matchless. The party was unusually large, but the presence of Coleridge concentrated all attention towards himself. The viands were unusually costly, and the banquet was at once rich and varied; but there seemed to be no dish like Coloridge's conversation to feed upon—and no information so varied as his own. The orator rolled himself up, as it were, in his chair, and gave the most unrestrained indulgence to his speech—and how fraught with acuteness and originality was that speech, and in what copious and eloquent periods did it flow! The auditors seemed to be wrapt in wonder and delight; as one observation more profound, or clothed in more forcible language than another, fell from his tongue. . . . For nearly two hours he spoke with unhesitating and uninterrupted fluency. As I retired homeward I thought a second Johnson had visited the earth to make wise the sons of men; and regretted that I could not exercise the powers of a second Boswell to record the wisdom and the eloquence which had that evening flown from the orator's lips. It haunted me as I retired to rest. It drove away slumber."—Dibdin's Reminiscences, i. 254.

In his Illustrations of Scripture, Mr. Coleridge was more largely indebted to Cocecius than to any other commentator. The reader should procure an essay, reprinted from the Eclectic Review, entitled, The Relation of Philosophy to Theology, and Theology to Religion, or S. T. Coleridge, his Philosophy and Theology. It is to be regretted that Coleridge did not devote himself in earnest to the preparation of the great undeveloped work which so long haunted his imagination. We must doubt if he could ever have succeeded in his ambitious aspirations to "reduce all knowledge into harmony"—"to unite the insulated fragments of truth, and therewith to frame a perfect mirror;" but that he could have produced a magnum opus, who can doubt? To those not familiar with the plaudits of Coleridge's admirers, the degree of admiration which was lavished upon him will appear almost absurd. No less a man than De Quincey speaks of him as "This illustrious man, the largest and most spacious intellect, the subtlest and most comprehensive, in my judgment, that has yet existed amongst men."—Literary Reminiscences.

Lord Egmont declares that "No man had ever been better qualified to revive the heroic period of literature in England, and to give a character of weight to the philosophic erudition of the country upon the continent."—Ubi supra.

Another most respectable authority gravely records his judgment:

"I think, with all his faults, old Sam was more of a great man than any one that has lived within the four seas in my memory. It is refreshing to see such a union of the highest philosophy and poetry, with so full a knowledge, in so many points at least, of particular facts."—Dr. Arnold: Letter to W. W. Hull, Esq.

John Foster, himself a moral philosopher of no ordinary rank, tells us that "His mind contains an astonishing map of all sorts of knowledge, while in his power and manner of putting it to use, he displays more of what we mean by the term genius than any mortal I ever saw, or ever expect to see."

A short extract from a well-known and favourite critic must bring our article to a conclusion:

"On his incomparable 'Genevieve' he has lavished all the melting graces of poetry and chivalry; in his 'Ancient Mariner' he has smiled, and in his 'Christabel' flown, to the very limits of invention and belief, and in his chaunt of 'Pore, Yamine, and Slaughter,' he has revived the reboiling strains of the sylvia, or rather furies, and given us a song worthy of the prime agents of perdition. . . . His translation of 'Wallenstein' I have heard commended by good judges, as superior to the drama whose language it professes to speak; and his 'Remorse,' though a play for the closet rather than the stage, has passages full of passion and fire. In prose his powers are not all equal: he is occasionally, indeed, graphic and lively, as when he gives an account of his voyage; often dramatic in the description of his success as a preacher of lay sermons; but he is too frequently obscure and mystical. . . . As his fame will be settled by his best poems, he is as sure of future reputation as any poet of this age."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM: Biog. and Crit. Hist. of the Lit. of the last 50 years.

Wm. Sellon wrote an answer to Coles, entitled, Defence of God's Sovereignty against the impious and horrible Aspersions cast upon it by Elisha Coles, 1770, 12mo. Romaine commends Coles's Discourse in high terms, and Dr. E. Williams tells the following anecdote concerning it:

"When setting out in the ways of God, I found this book singularly useful. A carnal minister (who had gravely recommended for my perusal Dean Swift's 'Tale of a Tub') observing my partiality to it, remarked with emotion, 'If the doctrines contained in that book be true, I am sure to go to hell.' I then replied, what I now deliberately affirm; 'If these doctrines be not true, I have no hope of going to heaven.'"

We have read the work with the attention and interest which the subject demands; but instead of giving our opinion of its merits, we consider that we do better by quoting both pro and con.

His lectures, and those of his coadjutors Grocyu and Sowie, did much to prepare the way for the Reformation by calling public attention to the Holy Scriptures. The boldness of Colet excited the animosity of Dr. Fitz James, Bishop of London. Whilst travelling on the Continent, Colet became acquainted with Buduus, Erasmus, and other learned men, and studied the Greek tongue, then much neglected in England; so much so indeed, that it was a proverb, Cave a Græcia, ne fias hæreticus—Beware of Greek, lest you become a heretic. Its introduction at Oxford was violently opposed. Colet, whilst yet living, appropriated his property to the founding of St. Paul's School. He appointed William Lilly first master in 1512.

New edit, entitled The with proper rules for the exercise of that agreeable study, Lon., 1804, 8vo. What a subject for a lady's pen!

Collier, Jeremy, 1650-1726, an English Nonjuring bishop of great celebrity, was b. at Stow-with-Quy, in Cambridgeshire. His father and grandfather were both clergymen of the Church of England. In 1669 he was admitted a poor scholar of Caius College, Cambridge. He was ordained deacon in 1676, and took priest's orders the year following. After officiating for some time at the Countess-dowager of Dorset's in Knowle, in Kent, in 1679 he removed to the rectory of Ampton, near St. Edmund's Bury in Suffolk. In 1685 he removed to London, and accepted the post of lecturer at Gray's Inn. He pub. a Sermon in 1686, and The Office of a Chaplain, in 1688. At the Revolution he refused the oath of allegiance, and with that undaunted courage and zeal which always distinguished him, he openly espoused the cause of James II., and vindicated the refusal of his Nonjuring brethren. We remember an acute observation of Mr. Burke, to the effect that it is sometimes as necessary to satisfy people with what they have done, as it is to stimulate those to action who are undecided. It was somewhat such conviction as this which caused Bishop Burnet to put forth in 1688 his Inquiry into the present State of Affairs, and in particular whether we owe Allegiance to the King in these circumstances, and whether we are bound to treat with him and call him back again, or not? The Bishop says "not," very decidedly:

"He having given that just advantage against himself, which came after all that series of injustice and violence that had gone before it, no man can think that it was not very fitting to carry it as far as it would go, and not to treat him any more upon the foot of acknowledging him King."

This elicited from Collier an answer under the title of The Desertion discussed in a letter to a Country Gentleman, Lon., 1688. In this reply the author states that there was no abdication on the part of James, and that there were no grounds, from the laws of the realm, to pronounce the throne void in consequence of a retreat impelled by a fear of personal danger. Edmund Bohun answered this treatise, and takes occasion to give a very high character of Collier:

"The author of it is my acquaintance and a person for whom I have a great esteem, both on account of his profession, and of his personal worth, learning, and sobriety, &c."

For this free expression of his opinions, our worthy Nonjuror was seized and committed to Newgate, where he remained for some months. He pub., in 1689, A Translation of the Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth Books of Sleidan's Commentaries; Vindici Juris Regii, or Remarks upon a Paper entitled An Enquiry into the Measures of Submission to the Supreme Authority; Animadversions upon the modern Explanation of 2 Henry VII., chap. i., or a King de facto. In 1690, A Caution against Inconsistency, &c. Dr. Sherlock's Cause of Allegiance considered, 1691. For a number of years afterwards, indeed until the time of his death, he was in the habit of attacking his opponents by minor publications, in which his zeal and honesty were very apparent. The most important of his works we shall notice presently.

So conscientious was he, that being admitted to bail, the government having the second time arrested him, he became satisfied that he had done wrong in thus tacitly admitting the power of the government to exercise any legal authority: he therefore delivered himself up to Sir John Holt, who, as we may readily suppose, when the good divine had explained his scruples, did not at all hesitate to exercise authority so far as to commit him to the King's Bench. He was, however, speedily released on the application of his friends.

The kingdom was thrown into great commotion in 1696 by the discovery of what has since been called the Assassination Plot. An insurrection was to be promoted in favour of James, and King William was to be assassinated, or made prisoner. On the 3d of April, Sir John Freind and Sir William Perkins were executed for treason at Tyburn. On this occasion, Collier and two other clergymen, Cook and Snatt, attended the unhappy men on the scaffold, and administered absolution to them; although they had justified what was styled their treason, in a paper delivered to the sheriff immediately before their execution. This gave great offence, and led to the imprisonment of Cook and Snatt in Newgate, whence, however, they were speedily released without a trial. Collier absconded, and was outlawed. Nothing daunted, however, by these frequent conflicts with the government, the courageous Jeremy put forth a Defence of his Absolution given to Sir W. Perkins at the place of Execution, Lon., 1694. In 1713 Collier was consecrated a bishop by Dr. Hickey, one of the Nonjuring clergy. Dr. Hickey had received consecration at the hands of the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough. Collier was a man of estimable character, and, as we shall presently see, one of the greatest literary benefactors ever enjoyed by England. One of his principal works was Essays upon Several Moral Subjects, part 1, pub. 1697; part 2, 1703; part 3, 1705. Part 1 consists of six Essays: 1. Pride. 2. Clothes. 3. Duelling. 4. General Kindness. 5. The Office of a Chaplain. 6. The weakness of Human Reason. The four first are in dialogue, written with great spirit and vivacity. The two last are continued discourses.

"That on the office of a chaplain is particularly laboured, and has been looked upon as the author's masterpiece."

The Second Part contains Seventeen Discourses: 1. Fame. 2. Music. 3. The Value of Life. 4. The Spleen. 5. Eagerness of Desire. 6. Friendship. 7. Popularity. 8. The Immateriality of the Soul. 9. The Entertainment of Books. 10. Confidence. 11. Envy. 12. The Aspects of Men. 13. Despair. 14. Covetousness. 15. Liberty. 16. Old Age. 17. Pleasure.

Several of these are written in dialogue, but most of them are discourses.

"They are all of them calculated to inform the understanding, reform the manners, and to give a right turn to the thoughts of the reader."

In the Third Part the author treats of—1. Pain. 2. Revenge. 3. Authors. 4. Infancy and Youth. 5. Riches and Poverty. 6. Debauchery. 7. Drunkenness. 8. Usury. 9. The Character of an Apostle. 10. Of Solitude. Then follows several miscellaneous pieces.

"If we abate the flowerness of the language, which was the fashion, I will not say the fault, of that time, it will be difficult to find any essays more capable of affording a rational pleasure than those of our author."—Dr. CAMPBELL.

In 1701 Collier pub. in 2 vols. folio, a translation with additions of Moreri's Great Historical Dictionary, under the title of The Great Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Dictionary. This was well received; and in 1705, a third volume appeared, under the title of A Supplement, &c.; and in 1721, a fourth volume, called an Appendix, was published. This bulky work is now in little request, although very curious and worth more than the few shillings asked for it by the London booksellers.

Before we notice the most useful purpose to which Collier applied his very respectable talents, we shall devote a few lines to the truly valuable Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, chiefly of England, from the first planting of Christianity, to the death of Charles II.; with a brief account of the affairs of religion in Ireland, collected from the best ancient histories, councils, and records, Lon., 1708-14, 2 vols. fol., (v. post for notice of a new edit.) This work called forth severe animadversion from three bishops, Nicolson of Derry, Burnet, and Kennett. But our doughty warrior, who cared neither for kings nor bishops, when he considered them in the wrong, and being "every inch" a bishop himself, again set the preas to work, and levelled his batteries against Bishops Burnet and Nicolson in 1715, and despatched Bishop Kennett two years later. At one period the price of this work had fallen very low.

"I have seen many a copy sold for little more than waste paper. But the age of book-vandalism is past."—DIDAKT.

It contains much matter not to be found in Mosheim, especially many curious particulars relative to the theological publications of the 16th century. Dr. Campbell speaks highly of this work:

"The method in which this history is written is very clear and exact, his authorities are constantly cited by the author, his remarks are short and pertinent, and with respect to the dissertations that are occasionally inserted, they are such as tend to illustrate and explain those perplexed points of which they treat, and contribute thereby to the clearer understanding of the narration. . . . Taking the whole together, it will be found as judicious and impartial a work, as the world, in doing justice to his talents, could have expected it."

See conclusion of this article.

We now proceed to notice one of that small number of books—of which the Letters of Pascal and the Romance of Cervantes are instances—which have been found sufficiently powerful to effect a revolution in public opinion, or to awaken sufficient opposition to real or supposed evils, publicly tolerated, to drive them into obscurity, or brand them with disgrace. Our good bishop lived in those evil days of corruption of morals which followed the stern morality which distinguished the ascendancy of the Puritans. From the splendid antechamber of a depraved monarch, to the humble tenement of the obscure artisan, the "pestilence" of licentiousness "wasted at noonday," lacking even sufficient remains of virtue to make it willing to wait for the twilight, with the less shameless libertinism of the days of Job. This was pain and grief of heart to the sensitive Reformer. Compelled to dwell among them, he "in hearing and seeing vexed his righteous soul from day to day," with that which, whilst he earnestly deplored, it seemed hopeless to try to remedy.

That master painter, Mr. Masson, has given us a sketch, in his own graphic style, of the morals of the time:

"Then came those days, never to be recalled without a blush—the days of servitude without loyalty, and avarice without love, of ducal islands and gilded thrones, the gardens of cold hearts and narrow minds the golden age of the coward, the bigot, and the slave. The king cringed to his rival that he might triumph on his people, each into a theory of France, and perished with complacent infamy, her degrading insults, and her more degrading gold. The crimes of barons, and the lusts of bishops, regulated the measures of a government, which had just ability enough to deceive, and just religion enough to persecute. Crime was counted to crime, and disgrace to disgrace, till the race, favoured of God and man, was a second time driven forth, to wander on the fumes of the north, and to be a by-word and a sinking of hand to the nations."—Mirror of Art. Brown, 1811, 364.

The unsound condition of public and private morality was faithfully reflected in the drama, and estimably displayed upon the stage:

"During the forty years which followed the Restoration, the whole body of the dramatists invariably represent adultery—we do not say as a parallelism—we do not say so an error which the violence of passion may excuse—but as the calling of a free gentleman—as a gross without which his character would be imperfect. It is as essential to his breeding and to his place in society that he should make love to the wives of his neighbours, as that he should love French, or that he should have a sword at his side. In all this there is no passion, and scarcely any thing that can be called preference. The love intrigues, just as he wears a wig, because if he did not, he would be a queer fellow, a city pris, perhaps a Puritan. All the agreeable qualities are always given to the gallant. All the contempt and aversion are the portion of the unfortunate husband. The dramatist evidently drew his hint to make the person who commits the injury graceful, sensible, and spirited, and the person who endures it a fool, or a tyrant, or both."—Contest Dramatists of the Restoration.

There is nothing too wicked, nothing too absurd, to look advocates and apologists. Therefore we need not be surprised to find Dennis, Drake and Pomeroy, Leigh Hunt defending, and Charles Lamb apologising for, such literary satires as Wycherley, Congreve, Farquhar, Vanbrugh, and, we are sorry to add, John Dryden.

The stage seemed to present an available point of attack on the ancient monster of social corruption, and Collier resolved to commence the war of extermination on its stronghold. In 1696 he published A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage, together with the Sense of Antiquity upon this Argument. In the preface to this work, now before us, he briefly states the object of his critique, and the necessity existing for a rebuke of the character attempted:

"Being convinced that nothing has done the Age than the Stage-Poets and Play-Actors, not only my Time better than in writing men, sure, take Virtue and Regularity to them in their distribution so very remarkable they have made their attack with great and very remarkable Advantage. But it was not in vain that half their Business. Our countrymen and foreigners have thought on and in they must not only Rob but further . . . I confess I have no Ceremony for Debauchery. For to Compliment Time, is but one Remove from worshipping the Devil."

The first charge is the immorality of the stage, and the natural consequences of such indecency. He shows that the theatres of the Greeks and Romans were far less guilty in this respect than the English theatre. In the latter part of the first chapter, he quotes the testimony of Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and Corneille against the abuses which he condemns. Chap. 2d is entitled, "The Profaneness of the Stage," which is proved by instances of "Curse and Swearing," "Blasphemy," "Abuse of Religion and the Holy Scriptures." He brings his grave charges against the writings of Dryden, Congreve, Otway, and Vanbrugh. Chap. 3d is entitled, "The Clergy abused by the Stage." Chap. 4th considers the subject of "Immorality encouraged by the Stage." Chap. 5th is devoted to miscellaneous reflections, "Remarks upon Amphitryon, On the Comical History of Don Quixote," &c. In chap. 6th he reinforces his position by citations from Heathen philosophers, Christian fathers, and Catholic councils. The sale of this work was so large, that the 4th edition lying before us bears the date of 1699; the first was published March 1697-98.

That Collier, like sensible disputants generally, may in some instances have stretched his indictment too far, and mistaken levity for sin, and want of taste for want of decorum, can be allowed without denying him the character to which he is justly entitled, of the Reformer of the English Stage. Not by any means that he cleansed entirely the Augustan Stables. He removed some abominations, but many remained, and exist in destructive vitality to this day. From that time to the present, the English and American theatres have been the prime corruptors of the morals of the people. The Stage is emphatically the School of Vice. We have sometimes pleased ourselves with the speculation that the drama might be purified, and made an agent of innocent amusement, and historical, perhance even moral, instruction; but we almost despair of such a renovation. Certain it is, that conducted as our theatres are at present, taking together that which is acted upon, behind, and before the stage, we consider that no one who has a proper regard for the interests of morality can consistently lend his influence or countenance to such demoralising exhibitions.

If it should be thought that we are too severe in our judgment, we answer that the facts of the case are in this, as in every other question, the best evidence. This evidence will prove that three out of every four young men who become victims to dissoluteness and intemperance are first introduced to vice through the medium of the theatre. As to the other sex—how fathers can permit their daughters, husbands their wives, lovers the objects of their affections, to have their eyes and ears offended by what must be heard and witnessed by them who visit the theatres, is marvellous indeed!

But to return to our subject. Collier's vigorous charge threw the ranks of the enemy into great confusion. His proofs were too strong to be evaded, his cause too good to be disgraced by ridicule. When they had a little recovered from the shock, Congress made a feeble attempt at a defence, which he entitled Amendments of Mr. Collier's Fable and imperfect citation from the Old Bachelor, the Double Dealer, &c. Vanbrugh also came to the rescue of his sorely-horned production, in a pamphlet which he called A Short Vindication of The Rakes and the Provoked Wife. Nor were these all. Collier had disturbed a hornet's nest. Betula, and Dennis, and Drake, attacked him with impetuous bawling, though unable to sting. Wycherley was suspected of being one of his assassins. Dr. Filmer took sides against the redoubtable Reformer in A Defence of Plays, which had better have been unwritten.

But a man who had the courage to deny the right of a king to his throne, and to beard bishops upon their bench, was not to be intimidated by a few licentious poets and their apologists. He followed up his first fire with unswerving resolution, in the following publications: 1. A Defence of the Short View, &c., being a Reply to Mr. Congress's Amendments, &c., and to the Vindication of the author of the Rolapson, Loc., 1699. 2. A Second Defence of the Short View, being a Reply to a Book entitled The Ancient and Modern Stages Surveyed, &c., Loc., 1700. This "Book" was written by Dr. Drake. 3. A further Vindication of the Short View, &c., in which the objections of a late Book, entitled A Defence of Plays, are considered, Loc., 1700. 4. Mr. Collier's Dissuasive from the Play House, in a letter to a Person of Quality, occasioned by the late calamity of the Tempest, Loc., 1703.

Collier's victory was not only decided, but overwhelming. Dramatists and actors from that time felt that a healthful public sentiment was in action, which would call them to account for at least business offences, and they became more circumspect, if not really more virtuous. It was not a little to the credit of Dryden, that he attempted no defence of that which he doubtless felt to be indefensible. He did not even put forth that most foolish of all pleas, which we are sorry to see sometimes used on behalf of others by writers who should know better, that he was no worse than the prevailing tone of the times. If this be a valid defence, how shall the world ever grow better? How did Collier happen to be better than the times? Had they not the same code of morality, in the inspired volume, two hundred years ago, that we have now? To hear such apologies, we might suppose that the Scriptures were a recent grant to mankind. Some years later, indeed, Dryden, in referring to the subject in the preface to his "Fables," entered a protest against the rough handling he had received, and put in a plea to mitigate the force of the sentence, but he winds up with a confession which is to the credit of his candour. He finds fault with Collier's rudeness, and the "horrid play of his railleury," and declares that "in many places he has perverted by his glosses the meaning" of what he censures; but he admits that he is justly condemned!

"I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts or expressions of mine that can be truly accused of obscenity, immorality, or profaneness. If Mr. Collier," he continues, "be mine enemy, let him triumph; if he be my friend,—as I have given him no personal occasion to be otherwise,—he will be glad of my repentance."

Dr. Johnson, in his Life of Congreve, gives an animated description of the battle between Collier and the Dramatic poets. Of the assailant, he remarks:

"He was formed for a controvertist: with sufficient learning; with diction vehement and pointed, though often vulgar and incorrect: with unconquerable pertinacity: with wit in the highest degree keen and sarcastic: and with all those powers exalted and invigorated by just confidence in his cause. Thus qualified, and thus incited, he walked out to battle, and assailed at once most of the living authors from Dryden to D'Urfey. His onset was violent; those passages, which while they stood single had passed with little notice, when they were accumulated and exposed together, excited horror; the wise and the pious caught the alarm; and the nation wondered why it had so long suffered irreligion and licentiousness to be openly taught at the public charge. Nothing now remained for the poets but to resist or fly. Dryden's conscience, or his prudence, angry as he was, withheld him from the conflict. Congreve and Vanbrugh attempted answers. . . . The stage found other advocates, and the dispute was protracted through ten years,—but at last Comedy grew more modest: and Collier lived to see the reward of his labour in the reformation of the theatre. Of the powers by which this important victory was achieved, a quotation from 'Love for Love,' and the remark upon it, may afford a specimen:

"Sir Sampson Sampson's a very good name; for your Sampsons were strong dogs from the beginning.

"Anglica.—Have a care! If you remember, the strongest Sampson of your name pull'd an old house over his head at last!"

"Here you have the Sacred History burlesqued; and Sampson once more brought into the house of Dagon to make sport for the Philistines." [Collier's Comment.]"

For a graphic sketch of this controversy, and of the dramatic poetry of the time, we refer the reader to Mr. Macaulay's Comic Dramatists of the Restoration, Edinburgh Review, January, 1841. The Reviewer admits the occasional errors in his indictment, into which an honest zeal betrayed the author of the Short View, but agrees with the verdict of the day, that

"When all these deductions have been made, great merit must be allowed to this work. There is hardly any book of that time from which it would be possible to collect specimens of writing so excellent and so various. To compare Collier with Pascal would indeed be absurd. Yet we hardly know where, except in the Provincial Letters, we can find mirth so harmoniously and becomingly blended with solemnity, as in the Short View. In truth, all the models of ridicule, from broad fun to polished and antithetical sarcasm, were at Collier's command. On the other hand, he was complete master of the rhetoric of honest indignation. We scarcely know any volume which contains so many bursts of that eloquence which comes from the heart, and goes to the heart. Indeed the spirit of the book is truly heroic. . . . Congreve's answer was a complete failure. He was angry, obscure, and dull. Even the Green Room and Will's Coffee House were compelled to acknowledge, that in wit the parson had a decided advantage over the poet."

Collier has received ample commendation from many quarters:

"I question whether any man can read Swift's Tale of a Tub, or Don Quixote's Visions, without finding himself the worse for it. In regard to all such indirect applications of wit, every young student may guard his mind, and rectify his judgment, by reading Mr. Collier's View of the Profaneness and Immorality of the English Stage: a book which brought Dryden to repentance, and does indeed beggar every work upon the same argument. It is the triumph of wit over scurrility: of piety over profaneness: of learning over ignorance; and of Christianity over Atheism."—Letter from a Tutor to his Pupils.

"It was certainly a very bold thing in Mr. Collier to attack at once the Wits and Widdings of those times: among the first were Mr. Dryden, Mr. Congreve, and Mr. Vanbrugh; among the latter, were Tom D'Urfey and many more; but he is certainly to be commended for forming so good a design as that of reducing the stage to order, and thereby preventing the morals of mankind from being corrupted, where they ought to be amended."—Dr. CAMERON.

"The public opinion ran so much against the defenders of the theatre, and in favour of their enemy, that King William considered Mr. Collier's book as a work which entitled the author of it to some lenity in a prosecution then carrying on in consequence of errors in his political conduct."—Preface to Shp. to Dodsley's Coll. of Old Plays.

Cibber observes that the calling our dramatic writers to this strict account had a very wholesome effect upon those who wrote after this time. They were now a great deal more upon their guard; indecencies were no longer wit; and by degrees the fair sex came again to fill the boxes on the first day of a new comedy, without fear or censure. We may be allowed to repeat the opinion that neither at that, nor at any subsequent time, has the box of the theatre been the most proper place in the world for a modest and refined woman. In concluding our notice of this warm-hearted, exemplary, and truly excellent divine, we should not forget to mention that Father Courbeville speaks in the highest terms of Collier's Miscellaneous Works, which he declares set him on a level with Montaigne, St. Evre-mond, La Bruyère, &c. He made a translation of the Short View into French, which gave him an opportunity of renewing his commendation. Collier has been suspected of a leaning to popery, because, towards the close of his life, he "mixed water with wine in the Eucharist, made the sign of the cross in confirmation, employed oil in the visitation of the sick, and offered up prayers for the dead." But we have many instances of an adoption of some particular ceremonies, and even doctrines of ecclesiastical communion, whilst other portions of the same code are vehemently denounced.

Bishop Burnet indeed complains of our author's Ecclesiastical History on this wise:

"There appeared to me quite through the second volume, such a constant inclination to favour the popish doctrine, and to censure the Reformers, that I should have had a better opinion of the author's integrity, if he had professed himself to be not of our communion, nor of the communion of any other Protestant Church."—Preface to the Hist. of the Reformation of the Church of England.

Now we believe the bishop to have been a truly honest man, many opinions to the contrary; but the charges of a party writer, and veteran disputant, must always be received with caution, and Bishop Burnet was "a man of war from his youth."

We are pleased to notice the appearance of a new edition of Collier's Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, from the first planting of Christianity to the Reign of Charles the Second, with a brief Account of the affairs of Religion in Ireland, with Life of the Author by Thomas Lathbury, the Controversial Tracts connected with the History, and a new and much enlarged Index, 9 vols. 8vo, 1852.

"There are only two writers of the genuine History of our Church who deserve the name of historians, Collier and Fuller."—Bishop Warburton's Directions to a Student in Theology.

"Collier died in the year 1726; his Church History is still one of our most, if not the most valuable of our Ecclesiastical Histories, and all his works display talents of no ordinary kind."—LATHBURY.

Collier, John Payne, b. in London, 1789, was entered a student of the Middle Temple at the age of 20, but found the attractions of Blackstone insufficient to overcome the blandishments of Elizabethan literature. He occasionally relieved his poetical studies by contributions to the Morning Chronicle, the Literary Review, the Edinburgh Magazine, &c. In 1820 he pub. in 2 vols. r. 8vo, The Poetical Decameron, or Ten Conversations on English Poets and Poetry, particularly of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James. The reader should secure this work.

"Few books lately published contain so much valuable and original information."—HALLAM.

The Poet's Pilgrimage, a Poem, appeared in 1822. This was an early composition. In 1825-27 he pub. an edit. of Dodsley's Old Plays, to which he added six dramas, and in a supplementary vol. (1828) he pub. five more dramas temp. Elizabeth. In 1831, in 3 vols. p. 8vo, appeared his excellent History of English Dramatic Poetry to the Time of Shakespeare, and Annals of the Stage to the Restoration.

"As an authority in all points connected with the history of the stage, the production of Mr. Collier not only stands alone in our literature, but it may be said, that he has so thoroughly sifted and discussed the subject, as to have left little or nothing to reward the labour of future inquirers."—Lon. New Mon. Mag., Aug. 1831. "A valuable record of the British Stage."—Metropol., Aug. 1831.

Mr. Collier now found a labour of love in the compilation of a Bibliographical and Critical Catalogue of Lord Ellesmere's Collection of Rare English Books. This was privately printed. In his examination of the treasures of Lord Ellesmere's Library, Mr. Collier discovered some precious documents, which threw much light upon the history of our (for we Americans claim a property in Shakespeare) great dramatist, and from these papers and other records, he compiled his New Facts regarding the Life of Shakespeare, pub. in 1835. In the next year appeared New Particulars, and in 1839, Further Particulars, concerning the same "great argument." In 1842-44 appeared the result of more than thirty years' toil, in the shape of a new edit. of The Works of Shakspeare, the text formed from an entirely new collation of the old Editions, with the various Readings, Notes, a Life of the Poet, and a History of the Early English Stage, 8 vols. 8vo; new ed., 1858, 6 vols. 8vo. See Lon. Athen., No. 1592. This work was preceded in 1841 by a List of Reasons for a New Edition of Shakspeare's Plays, which should be studied as a model for all editors. "Mr. Collier is entitled to the praise of having brought together all the known facts that in any way bear upon the life of Shakspeare."—Lon. Spectator.

"Thirty years of unwearied research into the history of his author entitle Mr. Collier to be heard."—Lon. Athen.

"The most perfect text with the fewest possible notes. Whoever wants to know what Shakspeare wrote must refer to Collier's edition."—Lon. Monthly Magazine.

Mr. Collier's Memoirs of the Principal Actors in the Plays of Shakspeare appeared in 1846. In 1847 Mr. C. pub. A Book of Roxburghe Ballads.

"Mr. Collier has made a most interesting and valuable addition to our store of old ballads by the publication of this volume, which embraces a class almost wholly overlooked by former editors."—Lon. Morning Chronicle.

"Mr. Collier's volume is a treasure of curiosities, rich as well as rare."

In 1848 appeared Shakspeare's Library, a Collection of the Ancient Romances, Novels, Legends, Poems, and Histories used by Shakspeare as the foundation of his Dramas. Now first collected, and accurately reprinted from the Original Editions, with Introductory Notices, 2 vols. 8vo. This valuable work places in the hands of the reader, for a few shillings, matter that could before have been purchased only by an outlay of hundreds of pounds, and which was in many cases altogether inaccessible. In the same year Mr. C. pub. Extracts of the Registers of the Stationers' Company of Books entered for publication, 1555-70. In the midst of his many labours, Mr. C. has occasionally found time to promote the objects of three societies in which he felt deeply interested;—he has edited several works for the Camden and Shakspeare Societies, and contributed to the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries, of which body he was made Vice-President in 1850. But it is by his last publication that Mr. Collier has produced a terrible excitement among the antiquaries and Shakspearian critics, real and mock. In 1849 Mr. C. purchased from Thomas Rodd a folio Shakspeare of 1632, which proved to be full of emendations, which a little examination satisfied the happy possessor were entitled to great respect, as the intelligent annotations of an early hand. In 1852 Mr. C. put forth a volume with his newly-found treasures displayed to the eyes of a curious world. The critics—many of them, certainly—were in ecstasies.

"In spite of our own anticipations, and in spite of Mr. Collier's own editorial spirit, we have here put forth by that gentleman a volume, which, if we mistake not, will do more for revolutionizing, and more for amending, the printed words of Shakspeare, than all the critics whose labours fill the one-and-twenty volumes of the Variorum Edition."—Lon. Gent. Mag., April, 1853.

"It will form henceforth an inseparable pendant to the received additions, and most undoubtedly take the lead over every other compilation of 'Notes and Emendations.' It is not going too far to pronounce that in intrinsic value it is fairly 'worth all the rest.'"—Dublin University Mag., March, 1853.

"Men have acquired reputation by a single emendation of Shakspeare; learned editors have exceedingly plumed themselves upon a few successful hits; the best critics have done but little;—here we have a book that 'at one fell swoop' knocks out a thousand errors, for the most part so palpable, when once pointed out, that no one can deny their existence, and substitutes emendations so clear that we cannot hesitate to accept them."—Lon. Athen.

"The corrections which Mr. Collier has here given to the world, are, we venture to think, of more value than the labours of nearly all the critics on Shakspeare's text put together."—Lon. Lit. Gazette.

See also the Lon. Examiner, Jan. 29, 1853; Morning Chronicle, March 28, 1853; Northampton Mercury, Feb. 12, 1853; Bell's Messenger, Feb. 5, 1853; Fraser's Magazine, March 1853. But veteran critics, who had been fighting for half a century over half a dozen "emendations," were by no means disposed to swallow twenty thousand at once. The commentators gave "horrid note of war," and Mr. Collier was soon stoutly assailed by those who felt themselves so far outdone in "emendations." Of course, we, occupying the position of a Recorder, not of a Judge, do not profess to have any opinion upon the subject. The Rev. Mr. Dyce's review of the Folio (Lon., 1853) will assist the reader in his inquiry; and he is also referred to a volume, pub. in New York, 1854, entitled Shakspeare's Scholar, by Richard Grant White, A.M.

Collins, Anthony, 1676-1729, a native of Heston, near Hounslow, in Middlesex, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He was entered a student in the Temple, but soon abandoned the law for the cultivation of such literary pursuits as might strike his fancy.

Unfortunately, he selected a department far beyond his depth,—theology. Essay concerning the Use of Reason, &c., Lon., 1707, 8vo. In the same year he took part in the controversy between Dodwell and Samuel Clarke respecting the natural immortality of the soul. On this subject Collins pub. four pieces, 1707, '08. Priestcraft in Perfection, 1710, 8vo. This work attacks the XXXth Article of the Church of England. It elicited several answers and comments, (see prefatory epistle to Dr. Bennet's Essay on the XXXIX. Articles, 1715, 8vo.) which were responded to by Collins in 1724 in his Hist. and Crit. Essay on the XXXIX. Articles. Vindication of the Divine Attributes, 1710, 8vo. Discourse on Freethinking, 1713, 8vo. This work caused much excitement, and Collins, alarmed, as it was supposed, at the noise he had created, took a trip (the second) to Holland, and remained on the Continent for some months.

"In this work Collins inveighs against the vices of the clergy, and attempts to prove that the divisions among Christians are a proof of the uncertainty of their principles."—Boswell.

Several answers appeared, and the great Dr. Bentley despatched the Discourse at a single blow in his Remarks upon a Late Discourse of Freethinking, in a Letter to F. H., D.D., [Dr. Francis Hare,] in two parts, by Philileutherus Lipsiensis, Lon., 1713, 8vo, 1719; and Camb., 1743, 8vo. In the next year, 1714, Lon., 8vo., Dr. Hare pub. The Clergyman's Thanks to Philileutherus, &c. Bentley's work was trans. into several foreign languages.

A Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, 1724, 8vo. "In this the author maintains that Christianity derives no confirmation from the prophecies of the Old Testament."—BOGUE.

This discourse was replied to by Whiston, Bishop Chandler, Dr. Samuel Clarke, Dr. Sykes, and Dr. Sherlock, and others: no less than 35 answers appeared. Whiston treats "Collins and Toland in very severe terms, as guilty of impious frauds and larceny."

In 1726 Collins pub. "Collins is one of the most subtle and mischievous of his tribe. He rejects as inadmissible every kind of testimony in behalf of Christianity, except that which may be drawn from Prophecy literally accomplished; and this he represents as the sole and exclusive evidence on which our Lord and his Apostles rested the proof of the Christian Faith."—BISHOP VAN MILDERT.

Collins, John M., and Ludlow, James R., editors of the 2d Amer. edit. of Adams's (John, Jr.) Equity, 1852, 8vo. The value of Mr. Adams's work on The Doctrine of Equity can hardly be exaggerated. It is a commentary on the Law as administered by the Court of Chancery; being the substance, with additions, of three series of Lectures delivered before the Incorporated Law Society of London, in the years 1842-45. The volume was pub. in Nov., 1849, shortly after the death of the author, who had added his final corrections to the whole of the work, with the exception of the last four chapters of the fourth book. The 3d American ed., by H. Wharton, reflects great credit on the editors and publishers.

"The task of the American editors has been well performed. Their notes are frequent, able, and full. Over two thousand cases from our reports have been added. Collins, William, 1720-1756, a lyric poet of the first rank, was a native of Chichester, and educated at Winchester School, and Queen's College, and Magdalen College, Oxford. Whilst at Winchester he wrote his Persian Eclogues, which were pub. in January, 1742.

"In simplicity of description and expression, in delicacy and softness of numbers, and in natural and unaffected tenderness, they are not to be equalled by any thing of the pastoral kind in the English language."—LANGHORNE.

"In his last illness he spoke with disapprobation of his Oriental Eclogues, as not sufficiently expressive of Asiatic manners, and called them his Irish Eclogues."—Life by Dr. Johnson.

About 1744 he came to London, "a literary adventurer, with many projects in his head, and very little money in his pockets." He pub. Proposals for a History of the Revival of Learning, planned several tragedies, and designed many works which he never wrote.

"His great fault was irresolution: or the frequent calls of immediate necessity broke his scheme, and suffered him to pursue unsettled purposes."—Dr. Johnson. See Disraeli's comments upon Johnson's remarks: Calamities of Authors.

In 1747 he pub. his Odes, but excellent as they were, they were entirely neglected, and Millar, the publisher, was a loser by the operation. In 1749 the unsuccessful poet received a legacy of £2000 from the executors of his uncle, Colonel Martin, who had previously befriended him. He paid Millar the money which he had lost by the Odes, and threw the remaining copies into the fire. An irregular life had combined with mortification and disappointment to unsettle his mind, and to avert the fearful calamity with which he felt himself threatened, he travelled for some time in France, in hopes of benefit from change of scene. But he returned home to enter that sad mansion—a lunatic asylum; from which he retired to the house of his sister at Chichester, where he died at the early age of thirty-six. Johnson visited him at Islington, and gives an affecting account of the interview. Collins held a volume in his hand. "I have but one book," he remarked, "but that is the best." It was a copy of the New Testament. Several edits. of his works have been pub.; one of the best of which is that by Rev. Alexander Dyce, which includes the Life by Johnson, and Observations on his Writings by Dr. Langhorne, Lon., 1827, r. 8vo. See Collections of English Poetry by Johnson, Bell, Anderson, &c. The Odes on the Passions, To Evening, To the Brave, To Mercy, and On the Death of Thomson, can never become obsolete. We append some opinions upon the works of this truly excellent poet:

"The works of Collins will abide comparison with whatever Milton wrote under the age of thirty. If they have rather less exuberant wealth of genius, they have more exquisite touches of pathos. Like Milton, he leads us into the haunted ground of imagination: like him, he has the rich economy of expression hallowed with thought, which by single or few words often hints entire pictures to the imagination. . . . Had he lived to enjoy and adorn existence, it is not easy to conceive his sensitive spirit and harmonious ear descending to mediocrity in any path of poetry; yet it may be doubted if his mind had not a passion for the visionary and remote forms of imagination too strong and exclusive for the general purposes of the drama."—Campbell's Lives of the Poets.

"One of our most exquisite poets, and of whom, perhaps, without exaggeration, it may be asserted, that he partook of the credulity and enthusiasm of Tasso, the magic wildness of Shakespeare, the sublimity of Milton, and the pathos of Ossian."—Drake's Literary Hours.

"He had a wonderful combination of excellencies. United to splendour and sublimity of imagination, he had a richness of erudition, a keenness of research, a nicety of taste, and an elegance and truth of moral reflection, which astonished those who had the luck to be intimate with him."—Sir Esmont Brydges.

"Of all our minor poets, that is, those who have attempted only short pieces, Collins is probably the one who has shown most of the higher qualities of poetry, and who excites the most intense interest in the bosom of the reader. He soars into the regions of imagination, and occupies the highest peaks of Parnassus. His fancy is glowing and vivid, but at the same time hasty and obscure. He has the true inspiration of the poet. He beats and melts objects, in the fervour of his genius, as in a furnace."—HAZLITT.

"His diction was often harsh and unskilfully laboured and injudiciously selected. He affected the obsolete when it was not worthy of revival; and he puts his words out of the common order, seeming to think, with some later candidates for fame, that not to write prose is certainly to write poetry. His lines commonly are of slow motion, clogged and impeded with clusters of consonants. As men are often esteemed who cannot be loved, so the poetry of Collins may sometimes extort praise when it gives little pleasure."—JOHNSON: Lives of the English Poets.

"Though utterly neglected on their first appearance, the Odes of Collins, in the course of one generation, without any adventitious aid to bring them into notice, were acknowledged to be the best of their kind in the language. Silently and imperceptibly they had risen by their own buoyancy; and their power was felt by every reader who had any poetic feeling."—SOUTHEY.

"Mr. Wilkie Collins has justified the expectations that were formed of him on the appearance of his first acknowledged romance, Antonina. Since then he has gone on steadily improving, each work making progress on the preceding one; and thus, we believe, is the most acceptable praise that can be offered to an artist. In his earlier works he delighted in the morbid anatomy and painful delineation of monstrous growths of mis-called human nature. As his mind has matured and mellowed, it has become healthier. Mr. Wilkie Collins has his faculty of invention well under control; and he keeps clear of extravagance either in style or incident."—Lon. Athen., Mar. 1, 1856: After Dark.

Colman, George, 1733?-1794, was the son of Thomas Colman, British resident at the court of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, at Pisa. George was born at Florence, but placed early in life at Westminster School, where he attracted attention by his talents and application. He was elected to Christ Church College, Oxford, in 1751, and took the degree of M.A. in 1758. Upon coming to London he studied law, and was entered of the Society of Lincoln's Inn; but poetry and the drama were more congenial to his tastes, and Littleton and Blackstone were soon abandoned. His first dramatic piece, Polly Honeycomb, was acted at Drury Lane in 1760, with great success; and his reputation was increased by The Jealous Wife, which appeared in the next year. When quite young, he had contributed some excellent papers to The Connoisseur, and about 1761 he pub. many humorous pieces in the St. James's Chronicle, (of which he was proprietor,) in which Bonnel Thornton, his old ally in the Connoisseur, was also a writer. In 1761 Lord Bath, a connexion, left him a handsome annuity, which was increased by the demise of General Pulteney (Lord Bath's successor) in 1767. In 1764 he pub. a Trans. of the Comedies of Terence, into familiar English blank Verse, 4to; and 1768, 2 vols. 8vo. This publication displayed uncommon abilities.

"A better translation cannot be expected; it is such as Terence deserved, and done by a man of almost equal comic powers with himself."—DR. A. CLARKE.

In 1768 he became one of the proprietors of Covent-Garden theatre, from which he soon retired, and subsequently conducted the Haymarket theatre. He wrote pieces (the list of his productions includes 35) for the stage, and trans. others from the French. In 1783 he pub. a new Trans. of Horace's Art of Poetry, with a commentary, in which he overthrows Dr. Hurd's hypothesis of the origin of this work. In 1789 he lost his reason, and died in 1794. His Dramatic Works were pub. in 1777, 4 vols. 8vo. This collection does not contain all of his dramatic publications. His Miscellaneous Works were pub. in 1787, 3 vols. 12mo; and some particulars of his Life, written by himself, in 1795, 8vo.

"As a scholar he holds a very respectable rank, as may be seen by his translations of Horace's Art of Poetry, and of the comedies of Terence; and his manners were as pleasing as his talents were respectable."

See Biog. Dramat.; Pref. to the Connoisseur.

Colman, George, the younger, 1762-1836, son of the preceding, was educated at Westminster School, Christ Church College, Oxford, and King's College, Aberdeen. He wrote many plays, of which The Iron Chest, 1796, was perhaps the most striking, and John Bull the most profitable. Sir Walter Scott commends the latter highly. See Biog. Dramat. He also pub. "Few books have caused more loud laughs than the Broad Grins of George Colman the younger; it is a happy union of mirth and the muse, and good jokes are related in so agreeable and facetious a manner, that they can scarcely be forgotten."—Lon. Lit. Chron.

In the preparation of this work, Mr. C. profited by the Essays of Bacon and the Materials of Burdon. It is one of the most excellent collections of apothegms in the language, but benefited none less than the author. A passion for gaming involved him in embarrassments, which forced him to abscond to America in 1823, to avoid his creditors. He next took up his residence at Paris, where he was so successful at play that in two years or less he is said to have cleared £25,000. A dread of an impending surgical operation so preyed upon his mind, that he blew out his brains whilst on a visit to Major Sherwell at Fontainebleau. What a commentary upon one of his own apothegms in Lacon:

"The gamester, if he die a martyr to his profession, is doubly ruined. He adds his soul to every other loss, and by the act of suicide, renounces earth to forfeit heaven."

Columbanus, St., supposed to have been born about 540, died 615, was a native of the province of Leinster, Ireland, according to respectable authorities,—though Mackenzie claims him as a North Briton. He founded the monastery of Luxeuil, near Besançon, in France, which he governed for twenty years. In 613 he founded the Abbey of Bobbio, near Naples, and died there, Nov. 21, 615. His poems were first printed collectively by Guldasti in his Parænetici Veteres, 4 Insul., 1604. They are in vol. viii. of the Bibl. Magna Patrum, Par., 1644, fol., and in vol. xii. of the Bibl. Maxima Patrum, Lyons, 1677. Congreve, William, 1666-1729, an eminent dramatist, was a native of Bardonia, near Leoda. His father, an officer in the army, stationed in Ireland, placed him at school at Kilkenny, from whence he was removed to Trinity College, Dublin. Returning to England, he entered as a student at the Middle Temple. Very early in life he pub. under the fictitious name of Cleophil, a novel, entitled Incognita, or Love and Duty Reconciled. In his 21st year his play of The Old Bachelor—written some years before—was acted at Drury Lane, and proved eminently successful. Lord Halifax gave a substantial proof of his approbation, by rewarding the triumphant author with a commissionership for the licensing of coaches—a prelude to future favours. Dryden commended the play as the best first effort in that line which he had ever witnessed. Mrs. Barry and Mrs. Bracegirdle, Mr. Betterton and Mr. Powell, whose personal attractions and artistic excellence had been brought forward to such advantage by the new author, were of course delighted, the audience was equally charmed, and in short the town was taken by storm. What a commentary is this upon the morality of the generation of that day! That a piece which could not with propriety be read aloud in the family circle should be hailed with applause by the thousands who crowded the theatre! In 1694 Congreve produced The Double Dealer, which was less successful than its predecessor. Dryden disgraced himself—no new thing for him—by most profane adulation of the author: "Heaven, that but once was prodigal before, To Shakspeare gave as much, he could not give him more."

Love for Love appeared in 1695, and The Mourning Bride, a Tragedy, two years later. He subsequently produced the Comedy of The Way of the World, a Masque, entitled The Judgment of Paris, and Semele, an Opera. After suffering for years from bodily infirmity and blindness, this thorough man of the world was summoned to that account which none can escape. In 1710 he pub. a collection of his works in three vols. 8vo; dedicated to Lord Halifax. Between this and Baskerville's impression, 1761, 3 vols. 8vo, there were many edits. The last edit. was pub. by Mr. Moxon in 1849, r. 8vo, edited by Leigh Hunt. In our article upon Jeremy Collier, we have anticipated much respecting Congreve—his controversy with Collier, the character of his plays, &c.—that we should otherwise have found a place for here. We have already intimated that the fact of the popularity of such productions as the plays of Congreve, Wycherley, and Farquhar, is a sufficient index of the moral tone of the age. Perhaps no English author has been lauded more by his contemporaries than William Congreve. We have already given an exhibition of the fulsome adulation of Dryden, the most distinguished literary man of his time. We may instance another:

"Mr. Congreve has done me the favour to review the Æneid, and compare my version with the original. I shall never be ashamed to own that this excellent young man has showed me many faults which I have endeavoured to correct."

Pope honoured him by the dedication of the Iliad, and better men than Pope so far forgot the tribute due to virtue, as to join in the general applause which rewarded the champion of the most shocking descriptions of vice. We are not surprised, then, that Voltaire should declare that Congreve "raised the glory of Comedy to a greater height than any English writer before or since his time."

The "glory" of such men is "their shame." Mr. Leigh Hunt, to the many mischievous tendencies of his pen, has added in his old age another offence to public decency and private morality, in his apology for, or rather vindication of, the licentiousness of Congreve's "gentle vulgarity." Charity would fain hope that the unhappy author, before his departure from a world which his talents might have done so much to improve—alas! that they should have been busily employed in the effort to corrupt and debase!—repented of his offences against God and man. For—to borrow the words of Lord Kames—

"If they did not rack their author with remorse in his last moments, he must have been lost to all sense of virtue."

"Congreve has merit of the highest kind. He is an original writer, who borrowed neither the models of his plot nor the manner of his dialogue. . . . Of his miscellaneous poetry I cannot say any thing very favorable. The powers of Congreve seem to desert him when he leaves the stage, as Asters was no longer strong than when he could touch the ground. . . . If I were required to select from the whole mass of English poetry the most poetical paragraph, I know not what I could prefer to an exclamation in The Mourning Bride," &c.—Dr. Johnson.

This extravagant commendation refers to the conversation in the Temple, act 2, scene 3.

"Congreve's Plays are exquisite of their kind, and the extensive heartiness and duplicity of some of his characters are not to be taken without allowance for the ugly ideal. There is something not natural, both in his characters and wit, and we read him rather to see how entertaining he can make his superior fine ladies and gentlemen, and what a pack of sensual berybottoms they are. His insects over a pool, than from any true sense of them as men and women."—Loren Hunt.

The reader is referred to Mr. Thackeray's English Humorists of the 18th century, article Congreve and Addison. Mr. Thackeray thus happily contrasts Swift, Congreve, and Addison:

"We have seen in SWIFT a humorous philosopher whose truth lightened one, and whose laughter makes one merrily. We have had in CONGREVE a humorous observer of another world, to whom the world seems to have no moral at all and whose ghastly doctrine seems to be that we should eat and drink and be merry when we can, and go to the devil (if there be a devil) when the time comes. We come now to a humorist that flows from quite a different heart and spirit—a wit that makes us laugh, and leaves us good and happy, to one of the kindest benefactors that society has ever had, and I believe you have opined already that I am about to mention Addison's honoured name."

Cook, Eliza, b. 1817, the daughter of a tradesman in the borough of Southwark, near London, gained considerable reputation when in her 20th year, as a poetical contributor to some of the higher class of London periodicals—The New Monthly Magazine, The Metropolitan, The Literary Gazette, &c. In 1840 a vol. of her poems was pub. in London, and was repub. in New York in 1844, under the title of Melais, and other Poems. Many editions of her poems, considerably augmented, have been since pub. in England and America. The Old Arm Chair, The Old Farm Gate, Home in the Heart, The Last Good-Bye, and I Miss Thee, My Mother! are known to and loved by thousands, both old and young. In September, 1849, appeared the first number of Eliza Cook's Journal.

"I am anxious," she remarks, "to give my feeble aid to the gigauntic struggle for intellectual elevation now going on, and fling my energies and will into a cause where my heart will zealously animate my duty."

Such philanthropic aspirations were not doomed to disappointment:—Elisa Cook's Journal now (1854) stands among the first in point of popularity and circulation in the list of periodicals, which have done so much for the mental culture of Great Britain and America.

Cooke, Thomas, 1702?-1756, a native of Braintree, Essex, a poet and man of learning. In 1725 he pub. a poem entitled The Battle of the Poets, in which Pope, Swift, and others were treated with more freedom than reverence. But Cooke excited Pope's ire to a much higher pitch by publishing in The Daily Journal in 1727 a trans. of the episode of Thersites in the 2d book of the Iliad, to show the blunders of Pope. For this exposure, and Cooke's share in Penelope, a farce, the reader already anticipates the penalty. If Pope was not a Hellenist, he was an excellent satirist, and Mr. Cooke was at once placed in the literary pillory yclep'd The Dunciad. In a subsequent edit. of The Battle of the Poets, Cooke notices this contemptible conduct of Pope, and speaks with little respect of his

Cooper, Anthony Ashley, first Earl of Shaftesbury,

1621–1683, a distinguished politician, educated at Exeter College, Oxford, the son of Sir John Cooper, Baronet, exercised a commanding influence upon the events of his time. His intellectual character was much admired by John Locke, who is supposed to have been indebted for the groundwork of his celebrated essay on Toleration to an outline drawn up by his lordship. A list of Speeches, &c. by this distinguished nobleman will be found in Park's Walpole's R. and N. Authors.

"He canted tyranny under Cromwell, practised it under Charles the Second, and disgraced the cause of liberty by being the busiest instrument for it, when every other party had rejected him."—HORACE WALPOLE.

"For close designs and crooked counsels fit,
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, unfix'd in principles and place;
In pow'r unpleas'd, impatient of disgrace."

Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel.

But after this satire was published, his lordship nominated Dryden's son to a scholarship in the Charter House, whereupon the poet thus made the amende honorable for his savage assault. He tells us of Lord Chancellor Shaftesbury:

"In Israel's court ne'er sat an Abethdin
With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean:
Unbrib'd, unsought, the wretched to redress,
Swift of despatch, and easy of access."

"Charles the Second said to him one day, 'Shaftesbury, I believe thou art the wickedest fellow in my dominions.' He bowed, and replied, 'Of a subject, sir, I believe I am.'"

"The celebrated Shaftesbury; of powers as universal as his ambition was unbounded; the idol of the rabble at Wapping; the wit and man of fashion among the courtiers at Whitehall; and a statesman in the House of Lords; whom the King, after listening to him in a debate, pronounced fit to teach his bishops divinity, and his judges law; a minister, a patriot, a chancellor, and a demagogue; in whatever direction he moved, the man on whom all eyes were to be turned; to whom nothing was wanting but virtue."—Prof. Smyth's Lect. on Mod. Hist.

A Life of the Earl, by G. WINGROVE COOKE (q. v.) was pub. in 1836. See Biog. Brit.; Barnet's Own Times; Athen. Oxon.

Cooper, Anthony Ashley, third Earl of Shaftesbury, 1671–1713, grandson of the above, had his early studies in part directed by John Locke, and was instructed in Latin and Greek by a lady of the name of Birch, who spoke these languages with ease and fluency. Under her care he became no contemptible scholar when only 11 or 12 years of age, at which time he was placed at Winchester School. After travelling on the Continent, he entered Parliament, and his remarkable apology for a speech on High Treason is still celebrated. In 1711 he again visited the Continent, and died at Naples, Feb. 4, 1713. His Letter concerning Enthusiasm appeared in 1708. The Moralist, a Philosophical Rhapsody, 1709. Sensus Communis, 1710. This is "a recital of certain conversations on natural and moral subjects." Soliloquy, or Advice to an Author, 1710. Letters written by a Noble Lord to a Young Man at the University, 1716. Letters to Robert Molesworth, Esq., 1716. Judgment of Hercules. Letter concerning Design. But his most celebrated work was his Characteristics of Men, Matters, Opinions, and Times, 1711–23, 3 vols. 8vo, and in 1732. Many sentiments in the Characteristics are considered as unfavourable to Christianity.

"Mr. Pope told me, that, to his knowledge, the characteristics had done more harm to Revealed Religion in England than all the works on Infidelity put together."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

This would seem to prove that his lordship found many readers of as shallow perceptions as his own. His Inquiry concerning Virtue is highly commended by Sir James Mackintosh, who does not admire his ordinary style:

"Grace belongs only to natural movements; and Lord Shaftesbury, notwithstanding the frequent beauty of his thoughts and language, has rarely attained it. . . . He had great power of thought and command over words. But he had no talent for inventing character, and bestowing life on it. The Inquiry concerning Virtue is nearly exempt from the faulty peculiarities of the author; the method is perfect, the reasoning just, the style precise and clear."—Frederic. Dissert. to Encyc. Brit.

Blair takes him to task for want of simplicity and ease: "His lordship can express nothing with simplicity. He seems to have considered it as vulgar, and beneath the dignity of a man of quality to speak like other men. Hence he is ever in buskins; full of circumlocutions and artificial elegance. In every sentence we see the marks of labour and art; nothing of that ease which expresses a sentiment coming natural and warm from the heart. Of figures and ornament of every kind he is exceedingly fond,—sometimes happy in them; but his fondness for them is too visible; and having once laid hold of some metaphor or allusion that pleases him, he knows not how to part with it."—Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres.

His great admirer, Horace Walpole, cannot brook his oratorical flourishes:

"His writings are much more estimable for the virtues of his mind than for their style and manner. He delivers his doctrines in ecstatic diction, like one of the Magi inculcating philosophic visions to an Eastern auditory."—R. and N. Authors.

Bishop Warburton is for a time uncommonly gracious, though afterwards not so courteous:

"The noble author of the Characteristics had many excellent qualities, both as a man and a writer. He was temperate, chaste, honest, and a lover of his country. In his writings he has shown how much he has imbibed the deep sense, and how generally he could copy the gracious manner, of Plato."—Ded. to The Free Thinkers, prefixed to the Divine Legation.

Cooper, Anthony Ashley, fourth Earl of Shaftesbury, only son of the preceding, wrote a life of his father for the General Biog. Dictionary; see vol. ix. 179, 1739. He seems to have been a much wiser man than his father, for we are told that "There never existed a man of more benevolence, moral worth, and true piety."—BISHOP HUNTINGFORD.

We must say that we prefer his Characteristics to his father's. Maurice Ashley Cooper, brother to the third Earl, added to the literary honours of the family by a trans. of Xenophon's Cyropedia.

Cooper, Sir Astley Paston, Bart., 1768–1841, son of the Rev. Dr. Cooper, Rector of Yelverton and Morley, Norfolk, studied surgery under his uncle, William Cooper, surgeon to Guy's Hospital, and the celebrated Mr. Cline. The latter assigned him a share in his anatomical lectures, and Mr. Cooper's class rapidly increased from 50 to 400 students, the largest class ever known in London. In 1792 he visited Paris, and attended the lectures of Desault at the Hotel Dieu, and those of Chopart. Returning to London, he resided alternately in Jeffrey-Square, New Broad-Street, and New-Street, Spring Gardens. His practice was very large, and in 1822 he realized the largest sum ever received by a medical practitioner—£22,000. For some years his receipts averaged £18,000 to £20,000. He was made a baronet at the coronation of George IV., in 1821. The Anatomy and Surgical Treatment of Inguinal and Congenital Hernia, Lon., 1804, fol. Crural and Umbilical Hernia, 1807, fol. Cooper, Bart., interspersed with sketches of distinguished characters, by [his nephew] B. B. Cooper, 1843, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Sir Astley was principally distinguished as a bold operator, a decided practitioner, and as a most industrious and popular teacher. Perhaps no man ever taught any branch of medicine who possessed more of this element of great success. His manners were of the most engaging kind, while his attention, urbanity, and regard for his pupils, were of the most exemplary character."—ROBERT DUNDEE THOMSON, M.D.

Although a bold operator, as Dr. Thomson remarks, Sir Astley seems to have been a very graceful one. Mr. Pettigrew tells us:

"The light and elegant manner in which Sir Astley employed his various instruments always astonished me, and I could not refrain from making some remarks upon it to my late master, Mr. Chandler, one of the surgeons to St. Thomas's Hospital. I observed to him that Sir Astley's operations appeared like the graceful efforts of an artist in making a drawing. Mr. C. replied, 'Sir, it is of no consequence what instrument Mr. Cooper uses: they are all alike to him; and I verily believe, he could operate as easily with an oyster-knife, as the best bit of cutlery in Laundry's shop.'"

On one occasion Sir Astley had a patient from the West Indies named Hyatt, who was a rather eccentric character, as the following anecdote testifies. After a skilful operation by the surgeon, he desired to know the amount of his debt.

"Two hundred guineas," replied Astley. "Pooh, pooh!" exclaimed the old gentleman, 'I shan't give you two hundred guineas;—there—that is what I shall give you,' tossing off his night-cap, and throwing it to Sir Astley. "Thank you, sir," said Sir A., "any thing from you is acceptable," and he put the cap into his pocket. Upon examination it was found to contain a cheque for a thousand guineas."

We doubt not that the respected professors of the healing art would all be quite willing to prescribe "West India Night-Caps" to their patients.

Cooper, James Fenimore, 1789–1851, a distinguished American author, was a son of Judge William Cooper, a native of Pennsylvania, whose ancestors had been settled in the United States since 1679. The subject of our notice was born at Burlington, New Jersey, on the 15th of September. He entered Yale College in 1802, and for the three years of his residence there applied himself diligently to his studies. In 1805 he obtained a midshipman's warrant in the U. S. Navy, and followed the life of a sailor for six years. How apt a scholar he became in this arduous school may be judged from the technical accuracy which distinguishes his marine sketches. In 1811 he resigned from the navy, and was married to Miss De Lancey, a sister of the estimable Bishop De Lancey of Western New York. Mr. Cooper's first volume was entitled Precaution, a novel of the English "fashionable society" school, with few indications of the remarkable powers of description and eloquence of narration which its successors evinced. He next pub. The Spy, a tale of the Neutral Ground, founded upon incidents connected with the American Revolution. The theme was one too closely connected with the sympathies of his countrymen to appeal in vain to their attention. The critic of the leading periodical of the country, in a review not in all respects the most flattering to the young author, compliments him "For having demonstrated so entirely to our satisfaction, that an admirable topic for the romantic historian has grown out of the American Revolution. . . . He has the high praise, and will have, may add, the future glory, of having struck into a new path—of having opened a mine of exhaustless wealth—in a word, he has laid the foundations of American romance, and is really the first who has deserved the appellation of a distinguished American novel writer."—N. American Review, xv, 281.

The popularity of The Spy was not confined to America. It was soon republished in many parts of Europe, and the reputation of the author was confirmed abroad as well as at home by the appearance of The Pioneers and The Pilot in 1823, and the last of the Mohicans in 1826. Between the two last works was pub. a novel (Lionel Lincoln) founded upon the early revolutionary troubles in America, which never succeeded in gaining the popular favour.

About 1827 Mr. Cooper visited Europe, and whilst abroad, gave to the world a succession of works of various grades of merit, of which a critical examination will not be expected in the limited space to which we are confined. The first of the works pub. in Europe was The Prairie, one of the very best of his productions—which was succeeded by The Red Rover, The Wept of Wish-ton-Wish, The Water-Witch, The Bravo, The Heidenmauer, and The Headman of Berne. He also pub. a vindication of the land of his birth from many current misrepresentations: doubtless the notions of the Americans did much to correct error and abate prejudices among candid foreigners.

But if Mr. Cooper was ready to defend his country when unjustly criticised, he was quite as willing to censure those faults to which he perceived a growing proclivity among some of her most prominent sons. We have no disposition to dwell upon family quarrels, and if we enumerate The Letter to his Countrymen, and The Monikins, a political satire, among Mr. Cooper's works, it is with no desire to revive controversy, but only to act the part of a faithful chronicler. To the last-named work succeeded the Gleanings in Europe: the Sketches of Switzerland, and the works on France, Italy, and England, the series comprising 10 volumes, excited much attention both at home and abroad. England, with Sketches of Society in the Metropolis, aroused in no small degree the ire of the London Quarterly Reviewer, who declares, not in the most courteous style imaginable, that "So ill-written—ill-informed—ill-bred—ill-tempered, and ill-mannered a production it has never yet been our fortune to meet. . . . We must say in justice to every thing American that we have happened to meet, either in literature or in society, that we never met such a phenomenon of vanity, folly, and fable, as this book exhibits—we say fable, because (whatever may be Mr. Cooper's intentions) his ignorance and presumption betray him at every moment into misstatements so gross, and sometimes so elaborate, as to have all the appearance and effect of absolute falsehood."

The critic indignantly denies Mr. Cooper's assertion that "the Quarterly Review was the organ of a national antipathy to America." It is hardly worth while to linger over such civilities, and we proceed to notice Mr. Cooper's other productions.

The American Democrat, or Hints on the Social and Civil Relations of the United States, appeared in 1835. Three years later Mr. Cooper gave to the world a work of a more elaborate character than its predecessors. This was a History of the Navy of the United States, Phila., 1839; 2d ed., Phila., 1840; 3d ed., Cooperstown, 1846; reprinted in London, Paris, and Brussels. A new ed., with a continuation, 1815-53, in a supplement of 100 pages from Mr. Cooper's MSS. and other authorities, was pub. in 1853.

"The work of an unsurpassed writer; it is so full of interest, and so abounds in the most vivid illustrations of American patriotism, enterprise, and courage, that it cannot be too widely circulated."—GEORGE BANCROFT.

"Mr. Cooper appears to be fair, and unworped by national prejudice in these records."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"We have perused this history with no little curiosity and with great interest."—British Naval and Military Magazine.

"These volumes are filled with the graphic records of daring adventure, and contain, in their narration of mere facts, a treasure to the lovers of sea-romance. The name of Somers is a household word in America; and the desperate enterprise in which he and his companions perished, is narrated in this work with an extraordinary effect."—Lon. Athenaeum.

"This is a very valuable addition to naval history. Mr. Cooper has used a commendable diligence in ascribing out whatever facts the early history of America affords, illustrative of the origin and growth of her national navy, and has dressed them out in a form as attractive as possible."—N. Amer. Review.

Commendation, however, was not the only response with which the labours of the author were greeted. The account of the Battle of Lake Erie was not suffered to escape without an earnest protest from several critics; and Mr. C. felt called upon to notice these strictures, in a volume pub. in 1842, entitled The Battle of Lake Erie, or answers to Messrs. Burgess, Duer, and Mackenzie. A fitting companion to his history is the author's Lives of American Naval Officers, in 2 vols. The novels of Homeward Bound and Home as Found also excited no little animadversion—the charge of misrepresentation being warmly urged against the author. To these succeeded The Pathfinder, Mercedes of Castile, The Deer-Slayer, The Two Admirals, Wing and Wing, or Le Feu Follet, Wyandotté, or the Huttet Knoll, the Autobiography of a Pocket Handkerchief, Ned Myers, Ashore and Afloat, Miles Wallingford, The Little-page series, including, 1. Satanstoe, 1845, 2. Chainbearer, 1845, 3. The Red Skins, 1846. Among the last of his publications were the Islets of the Gulf, pub. in Graham's Magazine, 1846, and the Ways of the Hour, pub. in 1850. A complete edition, carefully revised, of the works of Mr. Cooper, in 34 vols., was, very opportunely, published in 1855 by Messrs. Stringer & Townsend, of New York. An interesting sketch of the literary history of the great American novelist, to which we have been indebted for some of the above facts, will be found in R. W. Griswold's Prose Writers of America. We have lying before us many critical opinions from high literary authorities, upon the merits and demerits of Mr. Cooper's productions. Our space, however, restricts us to a few extracts. Indeed, works which have been translated into so many languages, and are in continual demand with each new generation of readers, are themselves the best evidence of their author's tact in the selection, and ability in the treatment, of the subjects upon which he employed his pen. It is but a slight deduction from the merits of so excellent a writer, to wish that upon some subjects he had written less, and upon others not at all. But it ill becomes those who share in the glory which the lustre of his name has shed upon the literary annals of his country, to quarrel with those eccentricities from which genius is but rarely free, and those occasional ebullitions which are the more remarked on account of the prominent position of the offender. Nothing is more easy than the condemnation with which the indifferent spectator visits the heated controversialist, and nothing more common than the transformation which makes him liable to his own censure. The proper inference to be drawn hence is, not that Truth should remain silent, and permit transgression to pass unrebuked, but rather that Charity should be ever at her side as a remembrancer of human infirmity, and man's many provocations and sore trials.

But we are occupying with our reflections the space which should be allotted to those who have better claims to be heard:

"The same sort of magical authority over the spirit of romance, which belongs in common to Scott, Radcliffe, Walpole, and our countryman, Brown, is, for us, at least, possessed by this writer in an eminent degree. Places, for example, familiar to us from our boyhood, and which are now daily before our eyes, thronged with the vulgar associations of real life, are boldly seized upon for scenes of the wildest romance; and yet our imagination does not revolt at the incongruity. . . . This seems to us no inconsiderable proof of the power of the writer over us and his subject."—N. A. Review, xliii, 152.

The critic, however, charges the author with many grave faults and signal failures in the delineation of character and manners; and it is somewhat remarkable that some of the most prominent critics among Mr. Cooper's own countrymen seem from the first to have been utterly unable to discover in our author those merits which have been so lavishly ascribed to him by others. There are occasionally, indeed, words of commendation, but they are scarcely discernible amidst pages of broad and unsparing censure. Whether just or otherwise in these abundant strictures, it is not in our province to determine. Certain it is, that if the author of The Spy and the Pilot could in his latter years claim to have been among the most voluminous writers of his day, the critics are not chargeable with the birth of so numerous a literary progeny. In his earlier days he received, indeed, many invitations to continue his walks in the realm of Romance, but the awkwardly-affected courtesy scarcely concealed the intentions of the lion which would persuade the lamb to leave the fold for the benefit of a summer day's excursion.

Abroad, the great American novelist has not escaped censure—we have already quoted something that can hardly be called compliment from the Quarterly Reviewers; but his distinguishing merits have been frankly acknowledged. Victor Hugo goes much further than Cooper's intelligent countrymen are willing to follow, when he places the author of The Spy above the "Wizard of the North."

A more discriminating English critic has recorded his judgment, that

"The power with which the scenes on the waste of waters are depicted, and the living interest with which Cooper invests every particle of a ship, as if it were all an intelligent being, cannot be excelled, and has never been reached by any author with whom we are acquainted. For these qualities his novels will live with the language, for we may look in vain elsewhere for pictures so vivid, so faithful, and so intelligible."

The Edinburgh Review grants our author all that is claimed above, and only does him justice in enlarging the sphere of his dominions:

"The empire of the sea has been conceded to him by acclamation; and in the lonely desert or untrodden prairie, among the savage Indians or scarcely less savage settlers, all equally acknowledge his dominion.

"Within this circle none dare move but he."

Messrs. W. A. Townsend & Co., the successors of Stringer & Townsend, will shortly issue a new ed. of Cooper's novels, beautifully illustrated by Darley, in 32 monthly vols. cr. 8vo, commencing March, 1859. We append a list, furnished by the publishers, of the dates of the first editions of the novels as separately published. The average sale of the novels by Messrs. Stringer & Townsend, for the last fourteen years,—1845–58,—has been fully 50,000 vols. per annum.
